This demand of the Latines, was not vnreasonable. For the Romans themselues were a Latine Colonie; besides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to bee all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any such capitulation. So a great battaile was fought betweene them: wherein the fortune of Rome preuailed, by the vertue of the Consulls.

Manlius

Manlius Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Conſuls, whom the Soothſayers aduertiſed, that the ſide ſhould be victorious which loſt the Generall in fight. Hereupon Decius the Conſull, expoſed his life to the Enemie, and purchaſed victorie (as was beleeued) by his death. In which kinde of deuoting himſelfe for his Armie, the ſonne of this Decius being after Conſull, did imitate his father, in the Hetrurian warre. But (as Tullie well notes) it was rather the deſperate reſolution of theſe Decij, that purchaſed victorie, by ruſhing into the midſt of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them; than any great commendation of ſuch a religion, as required the liues of ſo worthy Citizens, to be ſacrificed for their Countrie. The diſcipline of Manlius was no leſſe reſolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbad any one to forſake his place, and fight ſingle with an enemie. For breach of which order he cauſed his owne ſonne to be put to death, who had ſlaine a Captaine of the Latines, being challenged in ſingle fight.

When the Latines, the Aequi, Volſci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with ſome other people, were brought vnder obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend againſt the Romans.

Yet the Sabines aduentured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Conſull, waſting all their Countrie with fire and ſword, from the Riuer Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet ſubiection.

The laſt of the Italians, that made triall of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. Theſe had interpoſed themſelues as Mediatours, between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptorie denunciation of Warre, vnto that partie, which ſhould dare to refuſe peace, by them tendred. Theſe threats which diſcouered their bad affection vnto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were vtterlie ſubdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained that certaine ſhips of theirs were robbed, and ſent Embaſſadours vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon ſome wrong done to theſe Embaſſadours, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lucans, Meſſapians, Brutians, and Appulians, ioyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subiects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But ſome experience of the Roman ſtrength, taught all theſe people to know their owne weakneſſe. Wherefore they agreed to ſend for Pyrrhus, by whoſe aide (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines alſo were) great hope was conceiued, that the Dominion of Rome ſhould be confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which alreadie, in a manner it did ouer-ſpread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred vpon the Romans, and vanquiſhed them in two battailes.

PYrrhus, forſaken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deale with Lyſimachus, was compelled a while to liue in reſt: which hee abhorred no leſſe than a wiſer Prince would haue deſired. Hee had a ſtrong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vnſetled eſtate of things, was enough to purchaſe a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius had ſo encreaſed the power of Lyſimachus, that it was no point of wiſedome, to make an offenſiue warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the ſonne of Demetrius, held Corinth at the ſame time, and ſome other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treaſures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrrhus might haue wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that he might ſerue to giue ſome hinderance to Lyſimachus.

In this want of imploiment, and couetous deſire of finding it, the Tarentine Embaſſadours came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing no other aide then his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would caſt themſelues vnder his protection. They had in their company, ſome of the Samnites, Lucanians, Meſſapians, and others; which promiſed, in behalfe of their ſeuerall Nations, as much as could be deſired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conqueſts; that hee might enlarge his Empire to the Weſt, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eaſtward; and ſtill by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is ſaid, that once hee anſwered Cyneas his chiefe Counſailour, asking what hee meant to doe after euerie of the victories which he hoped to get: that hauing wonne Rome, hee would ſoone bee Maſter of all Italie; that, after Italie hee would quickely get the Ile of Sicil; that, out of Sicill, he would passe ouer into Africk, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrie; and being strengthened with the force of all these Prouinces, he would be too hard, for any of those, that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneas enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all: Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would liue merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his owne.

Neuertheless, this Italian expedition seemed vnto Pyrrhus, a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Armie, of almost thirty thousand men, well sorted, and well trained Souldiers: part of which he sent ouer before him vnder Cyneas, with the rest he followed in person. At his comming, he found the Tarentines very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, vtterly careless to prouide for the War. Wherfore he was faine to shut vp their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a strict muster, as was to them very vnpleasing, though greatly behooueing to their estate.

Whilest hee was occupied with these cares, Læuinus the Romane Consull drew neere, and began to waste Lucania, a Prouince confederate with the Tarentines in this Warre.

The Lucanians were not readie to defend their own Countrie; the Samnites were careless of the harme, that fell not (as yet) vpon themselues; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would haue beene, but their valour was little: all of these had beene accustomed to shrinke, for feare of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more vpon his owne forces, than the issue of their vanting promises. Hee was now driuen, either to set forward, with those that himselfe had brought into Italy, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to bee reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his owne sufficiencie, which by all meanes hee was carefull to vp-hold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had beene scattered by foule weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which hee resolued to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

Læuinus the Consull was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and giue him battaile, ere all his adherents should bee ready to ioyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slackenesse of the Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treatie of peace: requiring to haue the quarrell betweene the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellowes might arriue at his Campe; or whether, considering better at neere distance, the weight of the businesse, which he had taken in hand, hee were desirous to quit it with his honour; the short answere that was returned to his proposition, gaue him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Iudge, nor feared him their enemie.

Hereeupon, both Armies hastened their march vnto the Riuer of Siris: Læuinus intending to fight before the arriuall of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that Riuer, vntill his owne Armie were full. Vpon the first view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceiued by Pyrrhus, that hee had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue discipline of warre: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde, vpon the passage of the riuer, that hee might not bee compelled to fight, vntill hee saw his best aduantage. But hee quickly found, that this new enemie was not onely skilfull in the Art of war, but couragious in execution. For the Roman Armie entred the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time, began to passe the Riuer, in sundry places: which caused the Greekes to forsake the defence of their banke, and speedily retire vnto their Campe.

This audacitie forced Pyrrhus to battaile; wherewith hee thought it best to present them, ere the whole Armie had recouered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his battailes; himselfe with the horse, charged vpon the Romans: who stoutly receiued him, as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the duetie of a carefull Generall; nor his prouidence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personall valour. It behoued him indeed to do his best; for he neuer met with better

oppoſers. Once, and ſhortly after the fight began, his horſe was ſlaine vnder him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the vſe of his Kings armour, which was torne from his backe. This accident had almoſt loſt him the battaile: but hee perceiuing it, diſcouered his face, and thereby reſtored courage to his men, and tooke from the Romanes their vaine ioy. The fight was obſtinate, and with the greater loſſe (at leaſt of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his ſide, as long as onely ſpeare and ſword were vſed. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whoſe vnuſuall forme and terrible aſpect, the horſes of the Romans (vnaccuſtomed to the like) were not able to ſuſtaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman battailes, perceiuing their horſe put to rout, and driuen out of the field; finding alſo themſelues both charged in flanke, and ouer-borne, by the force, and huge bulke, of thoſe ſtrange beaſts; gaue way to neceſſity, and ſaued themſelues, as well as they could, by haſty flight: in which conſternation, they were ſo forgetfull of their diſcipline, that they tarried not to defend their Campe, but ranne quite beyond it, leauing both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victory was ſoone ſpread ouer Italie; and the reputation was no leſſe than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Conſull, with a ſelect Armie, ſhould loſe in plaine battaile, not onely the field, but the Campe it ſelfe, being ſo notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more brauely wonne by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, ſaue the vnwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well diſſemble his content that he tooke, in hauing the glory of this action peculiarly his owne, at ſuch time as he blamed the Lucans & Samnites, for comming (as wee ſay) a day after the faire. Neuertheleſſe, he wiſely conſidered the ſtrength of the Romans, which was ſuch, as would better endure many ſuch loſſes, than he could many ſuch victories. Therefore hee thought it good to compound with them, whileſt with his honour he might; and to that purpoſe he ſent vnto them Cyneas his Embaſſadour; demanding onely to haue the Tarentines permitted to liue at reſt, and himſelfe accepted as their eſpeciall friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberall gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could bee found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their deſire of recouering their captiues, or their danger, by the riſing of many States in Italie againſt them, ſo incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an olde and blinde Senator, did ſtirre them vp to make good their honour by warre. So they returned anſwere, that whileſt Pyrrhus abode in Italie, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report, that Cyneas made at his returne, of the Roman puiſſance and vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus, a great deſire of confederacie, with that gallant Citie. Heereupon many kinde Offices paſſed betweene them: but ſtill when he vrged his motion of peace, the anſwere was, He muſt firſt depart out of Italie, and then treat of peace.

In the meane ſeaſon, each part made prouiſion for warre; the Romans leauing a more mighty army than the former; and Pyrrhus being ſtrengthened with acceſſe vnto his forces, of all the Eaſt parts of Italie. So they came to triall of a ſecond battaile, wherein (though after long and cruell fight) the boiſterous violence of the Elephants gaue to Pyrrhus a ſecond victorie. But this was not altogether ſo ioyfull as the former had beene: rather it gaue him cauſe to ſay, that ſuch another victorie would be his vtter vndoing. For he had loſt the flower of his Armie in this battaile: and though he draue the Romans into their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor ſee any likelihood of preuailing againſt them, that were like to be relieued with daily ſupplies, whileſt hee ſhould be driuen to ſpend vpon his old ſtocke. Neither could hee expect, that his Elephants ſhould alwaies ſtand him in ſtead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would ſoone teach the Romans, that were apt Schollers in ſuch learning, how to make them vnſeruiceable. Wherefore hee deſired nothing more, than how to carry his honour ſafe out of Italie: which to doe (ſeeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting any faire conditions of peace, or of truce) he tooke a ſlight occaſion, preſented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How Pyrrhus, being inuited into Sicill, forsooke Italie; wanne the most of the Isle; and lost it in short space. Pyrrhus returnes into Italie; where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes backe to his owne Kingdome.

WHen Ptolomie Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, hee presently seized vpon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had been the due reward vnto him, that had slaine the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength & reputation enough, to aduance himselfe against Ceraunus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to haue him their King, that had (as hee professed) reuenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousnes of his fact, by which they were freed from subiection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that vpon remembrance of his Fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselues that his raigne might proue good, though his entrance had been wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serue to defeat Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, that made an attempt vpon the Kingdome. As for Antigonus, the sonne of Seleucus, he was farre off, & might be questioned abour some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie neere vnto Europe. Yet he made great shew of meaning to reuenge his Fathers death: but being stronger in monie then in Armes, he was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murtherer. While these three stroue about the Kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made vse of their dissention: threatning warre, or promising his assistance, to euery one of them. By these meanes hee strengthened himselfe, and greatly aduantaged his Italian voyage, which he had then in hand: requesting monie of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gaue him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (couenanting to haue them restored at two yeeres end) more for feare than for loue: that so he might free himselfe from trouble, and quietly enioy his Kingdome.

Thus Ptolomie grew mighty on the suddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked he increased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citie of Cassandria was held by Arsinoe his sister, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her yong children. Her he circumuented by making loue to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wife, with promise to adopt her children: a promise that hee meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he slew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his villanie found, vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation, that hee had neuer heard of. Belgius a Captaine of the Gaules, hauing forced his passage through many Countries, vnto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with monie, or otherwise, to looke for all the miseries of warre. These Gaules were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrie, to seeke new seates in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke, and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had diuided themselues, at their setting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell vpon Italie; the other passing through the Countries that lie on the Northerne side of the Adriatick Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adioyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeeme peace with tribute, as now they would haue compelled Ceraunus to doe; vnto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight yeeres after such time as their fellowes had taken Rome.

When their Embassadors came to Ptolomie, asking what he would giue: His answere was, that he would be contented to giue them peace, but it must be with condition, that they should put into their hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld vp their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor giue any credit to their words. At this answere, when it was returned, the Gaules did laugh; saying, that they would soone confute with deedes, the vanity of such proud words. It may seeme strange, that that he, who had giuen away part of his Armie vnto Pyrrhus, for very feare; should be so confident in vndertaking more mighty enemies. The King of the Dardanians offred to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gaules; but he scorned the offer; saying, that he had the children of those, which vnder the conduct of Alexander, had subdued all the East. Thus hee issued forth against the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victory must needes haue followed the reputation of a great name. But he soone found his great errour, when it was too late. For the enemies were not onely equall in strength of body, and fiercenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in numbers, that few or none escaped their furie. Ptolomie himselfe grieuously wounded, fell into their hands, whilest the battaile continued; and they presently strooke off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vtter astonishment.

The report of this great ouerthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Countrie as lost. Onely Sosthenes, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Armie, with which he many times got the vpper hand, and hindred Belgius from vsing the victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would haue made him King, which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a Generall. But (as mischiefes doe seldome come alone) the good successe of Belgius, drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captain of the Gaules, with an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and fifteene thousand horse; against which mighty Armie, when Sosthenes with his weake troupes made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themselues within their wals, leauing all their Countrie to the spoile of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and troden downe by a Nation, that they had not heard of; in lesse then fiftie yeeres after the death of Alexander, who sought to discouer and subdue vnknown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia, had beene too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these newes beene carried to Pyrrhus in Italie, who sought a faire pretext of relinquishing his warre with the Romanes; had not other tidings out of Sicil distracted him, and carried him away in pursute of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who reigned ouer the whole Iland, the Carthaginians sent an Armie to conquer Sicil, out of which, by him, they had beene expelled. This Armie did so fast preuaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to auoide slauery, than in submitting themselues to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, then to liue vnder the well knowne heauy yoke of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agragentines, principall Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadours, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieued Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so vnluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the businesse of Sicil more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he beleeued (as came after to passe) that his aduantage vpon Macedon would not so hastily passe away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leisure, ouer into Sicil he transported his Armie, leauing the Tarentines to shift for themselues; yet not leauing them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their Towne, to hold them in subiection.

As his departure out of Italie, was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature aduice; so were his actions following, vntill his returne vnto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, then well ordered, or note-worthy. The Armie which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand fiue hundred horse: with which, soone after his descent in Sicill, he forc't the Carthaginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He also won the strong Citie of Eryx, and hauing beaten the Mamertines in battaile, he began to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he draue Sostratus (to whom his cruelty was suspect) out of the Iland, & put Thenon of Syracuse to death, being iealous of his greatnesse; which two persons had faithfully serued him, and deliuered the great and rich Citie of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as he serued himselfe, and salued the dis-reputation of his leauing Sicill, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Samnites, imploring his present helpe

againſt the Romans, who ſince his leauing Italie, had well-neere diſpoſſeſt them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occaſion, he imbarked for Italie; but was firſt beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his paſſage, and ſecondly aſſailed in Italie it ſelfe, by eighteene hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the ſtraits of the Countrie. Laſtly, after he had recouered Tarentum, he fought a third battaile with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious ouer him, and forc't him out of Italie, into his owne Epirus.

A Prince he was farre more valiant then conſtant, and had he beene but a Generall of an Armie, for ſome other great King or State, and had beene directed to haue conquered any one Countrey or Kingdome, it is to be thought, that he would haue purchaſed no leſſe honour than any man of warre, either preceding or ſucceeding him; for a greater Captaine, or a valianter man, hath beene no where found. But he neuer ſtaid vpon any enterpriſe; which was, indeede, the diſeaſe he had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

§. IIII.

How Antigonus, the ſonne of Demetrius, deliuered Macedon from the Gaules. How Pyrrhus wonne the Kingdome of Macedon from Antigonus.

THe vertue of Soſthenes being too weake, to defend the Kingdome of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him againſt Belgius, failing him in his attempts againſt Brennus: the Macedonians were no leſſe glad to ſubmit themſelues vnto the gouernment of Antigonus, than they had formerly beene deſirous to free themſelues from the impotent rule of his father Demetrius. His comming into the Countrie, with an Armie, Nauie, and treaſure beſeeming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driuen to vſe againſt the Barbarians, onely thoſe forces, which he brought with him, hauing none other than good wiſhes of the Macedons, to take his part. Brennus, with the maine ſtrength of his Armie, was gone to ſpoile the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, hauing left no more behinde him, than he thought neceſſary to guard the borders of Macedon, and Pannonia; which were about fifteene thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe. Theſe could not be idle, but thought to get ſomewhat for themſelues, in the abſence of their fellowes: and therefore ſent vnto Antigonus, offering to ſell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuſe. Antigonus was vnwilling to weaken his reputation, by condeſcending to their proud demands: yet he iudged it vnfit to exaſperate their furious choler, by vncurteous words or vſage, as Ceraunus had ouer-fondly done. Wherefore he entertained their Embaſſadours in very louing and ſumptuous manner, with a royall feaſt: wherein he expoſed to their view, ſuch abundance of maſſie gold and ſiluer, that they were not ſo much delighted with the meat, as with ſight of the veſſels, wherein it was ſerued. He thought hereby, to make them vnderſtand, how great a Prince he was, and how able, if neede required, to wage a mightie Armie.

To which end, he likewiſe did ſhew vnto them, his Campe and Nauie, but eſpecially his Elephants. But all this brauery ſerued onely to kindle their greedy appetites; who ſeeing his ſhips heauy loaden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified, himſelfe (as it ſeemed) ſecure, and his men, both in ſtrength and courage inferiour vnto the Gaules, thought all time loſt, wherein they ſuffered the preſent poſſeſſours, to ſpend the riches which they accompted aſſuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of ſpoyle and purchaſe: which tale, carried the Gaules head-long, to Antigonus his campe, where they expected a greater bootie, then the victory ouer Ceraunus had giuen to Belgius. Their comming was terrible and ſuddaine; yet not ſo ſuddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who diſtruſting the courage of his owne men, diſlodged ſomewhat before their arriuall, and conueighed himſelfe, with his whole armie and carriage, into certaine woods adioyning, where he lay cloſe.

The Gaules, finding his Campe forſaken, were not haſtie to purſue him, but fell to ranſacking the emptie Cabbines of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either loſt or hidden. At length, when they had ſearched euery place in vaine, angrie at their

loſt labour, they marched with all ſpeede towards the Sea-ſide; that they might fall vpon him, whileſt he was buſie in getting his men and carriages a ſhip-board. But the ſucceſſe was no way anſwerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were ſo careleſſe of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the ſpoyle of what they found on the ſhore, and in ſuch ſhips as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in couert; and had ſaued it ſelfe by getting aboard the fleet: in which number were ſome well experienced men of war: who diſcouering the much aduantage offred vnto them, by the deſperate preſumption of their enemies, tooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manly hold vpon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great reſolution, gaue ſo braue a charge vpon the diſordered Gaules, that their contemptuous boldneſſe was thereby changed into ſuddaine feare, and they, after a great ſlaughter, driuen to caſt themſelues into the ſeruice of Antigonus.

The fame of this victory, cauſed all the barbarous Nations in thoſe quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient beliefe of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and reſiſtleſſe oppreſſors of ſo many Countries, were ouerthrowne.

To ſpeake more of the Gaules in this place; and to ſhew how, about theſe times, three Tribes of them paſſed ouer into Aſia the leſſe, with their warres and conqueſts there; I hold it needeleſſe: the victorious armes of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countries which now they wanne, ſhall giue better occaſion, to rehearſe theſe matters briefly.

Howſoeuer the good ſucceſſe of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had won this victory, could not thereupon be perſwaded to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no intereſt in the honour of the ſeruice, wherein his conduct was no better, then creeping into a wood.

This (as preſently will appeare) was greatly helpefull vnto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not ſo much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie ſtood vpon hard tearmes, had ſent vnto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in caſe it were denied. So was he ſure to get, either a ſupply, wherewith to continue his warre againſt the Romans, or ſome ſeeming honourable pretence, to forſake Italie, vnder colour of making his word good, in ſeeking reuenge. The threats which he had vſed in brauery, meere neceſſitie forced him, at his returne into Epirus, to put in practiſe.

He brought home with him, eight thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe: an armie too little to be employed, by his reſtleſſe nature, in any action of importance; yet greater then he had meanes to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell vpon Macedon; intending to take what ſpoile he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his firſt entrance into this buſineſſe, two thouſand of Antigonus his Souldiers reuolted vnto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, receiued him. Such faire beginnings, eaſily perſwaded the courage of this daring Prince, to ſet vpon Antigonus himſelfe, and to hazard his fortune, in triall of a battaile, for the whole Kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonus had no deſire to fight with this hot warriour; but thought it the wiſeſt way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Country. For Pyrrhus ouertooke him in a ſtreight paſſage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gaules, and the Elephants, which were thought the beſt of his ſtrength: a manifeſt proofe that he was in retrait. The Gaules very brauely ſuſtained Pyrrhus his impreſſion; yet were broken at length (when moſt of them were ſlaine) after a ſharpe fight: wherein it ſeemes that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the ſtreight, and not aduancing to their ſuccour, tooke away their courage by deceiuing their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken ſoone after; who finding themſelues expoſed to the ſame violence that had conſumed ſo many of the Gaules, yeelded themſelues and the beaſts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great diſcomfort; which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their ſtrength. Where the Phalanx could be charged onely in a front, it was a matter of extreame difficultie (if not impoſſible) to force it. But the Macedonians had ſeene ſo much, that they had no deſire to fight againſt Pyrrhus; who diſcouered ſo well their affections, that he aduentured aduentured to draw neere in person, and exhort them to yeelde. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower. All forsooke Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and money enough to entertaine a greater power, had he knowne where to leuie it. But whilest he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gaules into his seruice; whereby he might repaire his losse: Ptolomie, the sonne of Pyrrhus, came vpon him, and easily defeating his weake forces, draue him to flye from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes a farre off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himselfe a King.

This good successe reuiued the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all sorrow, of his late mis-fortunes in the Roman warre: so that he sent for his sonne Helenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come ouer into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselues.

§. V.

PYrrhus had now conceiued a great hope, that nothing shold be able to withstand him; seeing, that in open fight, he had vanquished the Gaules, beaten Antigonus, and wonne the Kingdome of Macedon; There was not in all Greece, nor, indeede, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserued to be set vp against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what he pleased. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of fiue and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and foure and twentie Elephants; pretending warre against Antigonus, and the giuing liberty to those Townes in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subiection; though it was easily discouered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important, then warre against a Prince already vanquished, and almost vtterly deiected. Especially the Lacedæmonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrie, had betaken himselfe to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdome. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make shew of any displeasure that he bare vnto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to haue two of his owne yonger sonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, euen till he entred vpon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himselfe as an open enemy: excusing himselfe and his former dissembling words, with a iest; That he followed herein the Lacedæmonian custome, of concealing what was truely purposed. It had beene, indeede, the manner of the Lacedæmonians, to deale in like sort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they sought to oppresse: but now they complained of that, as falshood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwaies practised in wisedome, till it made them distrusted, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Neuertheless, they were not wanting to themselues in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; causing such as could beare armes, to reserue themselues fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had vnwisely deferred, vpon assurance of preuailing.

Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, otherwise then with armed Citizens, soone after this (it being built vpon vneuen ground, and for the most part, hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with wals; at the present, only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance seemed most easie. Three dayes together it was assailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding fiercely; and no lesse stourly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserued the Towne the first day, whereinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindefull of sauing the person of their King, then of breaking into the Citie, though already they had

torne in ſunder the barricadoes. Preſently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta with a good ſtrength of men; and Areus the King returned out of Crete (where he had beene helping his friends in warre) with two thouſand men, little knowing the danger, in which his owne countrie ſtood, vntill he was almoſt at home. Theſe ſuccours did not more animate the Spartans, then kindle in Pyrrhus a deſire to preuaile againſt all impediments. But the third dayes worke ſhewed, how great his error had beene, in forbearing to aſſault the Towne at his firſt comming. For he was ſo manfully repelled, that he ſaw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwiſe than by a long ſiege: in which tedious courſe he had no deſire to ſpend his time.

Antigonus had now raiſed an Armie, though not ſtrong enough to meete the enemie in plaine field, yet able to hinder all his purpoſes. This made Pyrrhus doubtfull what way to take; being diuerſly affected, by the difficultie of his enterpriſe in hand, and the ſhame of taking a repulſe in his firſt attempt. Whileſt he was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inuiting him thither, with promiſe, to deliuer that Citie into his hands.

Ciuill diſſenſion raging then hotly in Argos, cauſed the heads of ſeueral factions to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the comming of theſe two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them deſirous to rid their hand of ſuch powerfull Aſſiſtants, as each of the two Kings pretended himſelfe to be. Antigonus told the Argiues, that he came to ſaue them from the tyrannie of Pyrrhus: and that he would be gone if they needed not his helpe. On the other ſide, Pyrrhus would needes perſwade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them ſafe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they ſo deſired.

The Argiues tooke ſmall pleaſure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at ſtrife, which of them ſhould keepe the Chickins from his enemie: and therefore prayed them both, to diuert their powers ſome other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condeſcended, and gaue Hoſtages to aſſure his word: for he was the weaker, and ſtood in neede of good-will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promiſe: Hoſtages he would giue none, to his inferiours: eſpecially, meaning deceipt. This made them ſuſpect his purpoſe to be ſuch, as, indeede, it was. Yet he leſſe regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of aſſurance, by giuing ſuch a bond, as he intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie ſhould be opened by night vnto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Armie, without any tumult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backes, cloyed the way, being too high to paſſe the Gate. The taking off, and ſetting on againe, of thoſe Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both giue alarme to the Citie, and ſome leiſure to take order for defence, before ſo many were entred, as could fully maſter it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindred the Gaules (that had the Vantgarde) being ignorant of the wayes, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other ſide, had much aduantage, by their knowledge of euery by-paſſage: and ſetting vpon the enemies on all ſides, did put them to great loſſe, and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore, vnderſtanding by the confuſed noiſe, and vnequall ſhoutings of his owne men, that they were in diſtreſſe, entred the Citie in perſon, to take order for their reliefe, and aſſurance of the place. But the darkeneſſe, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, vntill breake of day. Then began he to make his paſſage by force, and ſo farre preuailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is ſaid, that ſeeing in that place, the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in ſuch poſiture as if they had beene combattant, he called to minde an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he ſhould behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retrait.

Indeede, the comming of Antigonus to the reſcue, the diſorder and confuſion of his owne men; with diuers ill accidents, gaue him reaſonable cauſe to haue retired out of the Citie, though the Wolfe and Bull had beene away. The tumult was ſuch, that no directions could be heard; but as ſome gaue backe, ſo did others thruſt forward, and the Argiues preſſing hard vpon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retrait, with his owne ſword.

ſword. The tops of the houſes were couered with women, that ſtood looking on the fight. Among theſe was one, that ſaw her owne ſonne in dangerous caſe, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore, ſhe tooke a tile-ſtone, or ſlate, and threw it ſo violently downe on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to ground aſtoniſhed with the blow; and lying in that caſe, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the reſtleſſe ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith poſſeſſed the armie, the body, and the children of his enemy. The body of Pyrrhus had honourable funerall, and was giuen by Antigonus vnto Helenus his ſonne; which yong Prince he graciouſly ſent home, into his Fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdome of Macedon; the poſterity of Seleucus reigned ouer Aſia and Syria; and the houſe of Ptolomie had quiet poſſeſſion of Ægypt: vntill ſuch time, as the Citie of Rome, ſwallowing all vp, digeſted theſe, among other Countries, into the body of her owne Empire.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the setled rule of ALEXANDERS Successors in the East, vntill the ROMANS, preuailing ouer all, made Conquest of ASIA and MACEDON.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the first Punicke Warre.

§. I.

A discussion of that probleme of Liuie, Whether the Romans could haue resisted the great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the English.

WHAT question handled by Liuie, whether the great Alexander could haue prevailed against the Romans, if after his Easterne conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath beene, and is, the subiect of much dispute; which (as it seemes to me) the arguments on both sides doe not so well explaine, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath giuen, of the Roman power, in his dayes. For, if he, a Commander (in Hannibals iudgement) inferior to Alexander, though to none else, could with small strength of men, and little store of money, or of other needefull helpes in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their Estate, when it was well setled, and held the best part of Italie, vnder a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander haue done, that was aboundantly prouided of all which is needfull to a Conquerour, wanting onely matter of emploiment, comming vpon them before their Dominion was halfe so well setled? It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more, than thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse (as indeede, at his first passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more,) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate Asiatiques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolomie, Antigonus, and Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed, euery one of which (to omit others) commanded onely some fragment of this dead Emperours power, shall easily finde, that such a reckoning is farre short of the truth.

It were needeleſſe to speake of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of batterie, and the the like: of all which, the Macedonian had aboundance; the Roman hauing nought, saue men and armes. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punick warre, were trained, in the rudiments of Nauigation; sitting vpon the shoare, and beating the sand with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to lanch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceiue, how farre too weake they would haue proued in such seruices.

Now for helpers in warre; I doe not see, why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deserue to be laid in ballance, against those parts of Italie, which the Romans held in ill-assured subiection. To omit therefore all benefit, that the Easterne world, more wealthy, indeede, than valiant, could haue afforded vnto the Macedonian: let vs onely coniecture, how the States of Sicill and Carthage, neerest neighbours to such a quarrell (had it happened) would haue stood affected. The Sicilians were, for the most part, Gretians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily haue submitted themselues vnto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselues, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexanders comming into those parts, would haue brought excessiue ioy, to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subiects. As for the Carthaginians; if Agathocles, the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne besieged Citie, could, by aduenturing to saile into Africke, put their Dominion, yea and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazard; shall we thinke that they would haue beene able to withstand Alexander? But, why doe I question their abilitie, seeing that they sent Embassadours, with their submission, as farre as Babylon, ere the warre drew neare them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none, that forsooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) haue opposed their valour, and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countries, to them knowne, if they would haue made resistance. How they could haue sped well, in vndertaking such a match; it is vneasie to finde in discourse of humane reason. It is true; that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is against cowardly fooles, and the vnfortunate: for whosoeuer contends with one too mightie for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power; or else must looke, both to be ouer-come, and to be cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in those dayes the better Souldier, I will not take vpon me to determine: though I might, without partialitie, deliuer mine owne opinion, and preferre that Armie, which followed not onely Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of warre; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning fortune; who can giue a rule that shall alwayes hold? Alexander was victorious in euery battaile that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of euery warre. But forasmuch as Liuie hath iudged this a matter worthy of consideration; I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italie: where in three yeares after his death, the two Roman Consuls, together with all the power of that State, were surprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld vp their armes. We may therefore permit Liuie to admire his owne Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captaines of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equall to his followers: that the same conceit should blind our iudgement, we cannot permit without much vanitie.

Now in deciding such a controuersie, me thinkes it were not amisse, for an Englishman, to giue such a sentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) betweene the Ardeates and Aricini, that stroue about a peece of land; saying, That it belonged vnto neither of them, but vnto the Romans themselues.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman, were the best Warriour? I will answere: The Englishmen. For it will soone appeare, to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no aduantage of weapon; against no sauage or vnmanly people; the enemy being farre superiour vnto vs in number, and all needefull prouisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of warre.

In what ſort Philip wan his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Perſians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquiſhed; as likewiſe of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, againſt ſuch armes as it commonly encountred: any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing ſtorie of them, doth ſufficiently vnderſtand. Yet was this Phalanx neuer, or very ſeldome, able to ſtand, againſt the Roman Armies: which were embattailed in ſo excellent a forme, as I know not, whether any Nation beſides them haue vſed, either before or ſince. The Roman weapons likewiſe, both offenſiue and defenſiue, were of greater vſe, than thoſe with which any other Nation hath ſerued, before the fiery inſtruments of Gun-powder were knowne. As for the enemies, with which Rome had to doe: we finde, that they, which did ouer-match her in numbers, were as farre ouer-matched by her, in weapons; and that they, of whom ſhe had little aduantage in armes, had as little aduantage of her in multitude. This alſo (as Plutarch well obſerueth) was a part of her happineſſe; that ſhe was neuer ouer-laied with too great warres at once.

Hereby it came to paſſe, that hauing at firſt increaſed her ſtrength, by acceſſion of the Sabines; hauing won the State of Alba, againſt which ſhe aduentured her owne ſelfe, as it were in wager, vpon the heads of three Champions: and hauing thereby made her ſelfe Princeſſe of Latium: ſhe did afterwards, by long warre, in many ages, extend her Dominion ouer all Italie. The Carthaginians had well-neare oppreſſed her: but her Souldiers were Mercinarie; ſo that for want of proper ſtrength, they were eaſily beaten at their owne doores. The Ætolians, and with them all, or the moſt of Greece, aſſiſted her againſt Philip the Macedonian: he being beaten, did lend her his helpe, to beat the ſame Ætolians. The warres againſt Antiochus, and other Aſiatiques, were ſuch as gaue to Rome ſmall cauſe of boaſt, though much of ioy: for thoſe oppoſites were as baſe of courage, as the lands which they held were aboundant of riches. Sicil, Spaine, and all Greece, fell into her hands by vſing her aide, to protect them againſt the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I ſhall not neede to ſpeake of her other conqueſts: it was eaſie to get more when ſhe had gotten all this. It is not my purpoſe to diſgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemiſh the reputation of ſo many famous victories: I am not ſo idle. This I ſay, that among all their wars, I finde not any, wherein their valour hath appeared, comparable to the Engliſh. If my iudgement ſeeme ouer-partiall; our warres in France may helpe to make it good.

Firſt, therefore it is well knowne; that Rome (or perhaps all the world beſides) had neuer any ſo braue a Commander in warre, as Iulius Cæſar: and that no Roman armie was comparable vnto that, which ſerued vnder the ſame Cæſar. Likewiſe, it is apparent, that this gallant Armie, which had giuen faire proofe of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Heluetian warre, when it firſt entred into Gaule; was neuertheleſſe vtterly diſheartned, when Cæſar led it againſt the Germans. So that we may iuſtly impute, all that was extraordinary in the valour of Cæſars men, to their long exerciſe, vnder ſo good a Leader, in ſo great a warre. Now let vs in generall, compare with the deedes done by theſe beſt of Roman Souldiers, in their principall ſeruice; the things performed in the ſame Countrie, by our common Engliſh Souldiers, leauied in haſte, from following the Cart, or ſitting on the ſhop-ſtall: ſo ſhall we ſee the difference. Herein will wee deale fairely, and beleeue Cæſar, in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Hiſtorians to witneſſe, what actions were performed by the Engliſh. In Cæſars time, France was inhabited by the Gaules, a ſtout people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were ſubdued; euen when the Romans gaue them aſſiſtance. The Countrie of Gaule was rent in ſunder (as Cæſar witneſſeth) into many Lordſhips: ſome of which were gouerned by petty Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in ſuch ſort as might make it appliable to the neareſt Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not onely in generall through the whole Countrie, but betweene the pettie States, yea in euery Citie, and almoſt in euery houſe. What greater aduantage could a Conquerour deſire? Yet there was a greater. Arioviſtus, with his Germans, had ouer-run the Countrie, and held much part of it in ſubiection, little different from meere ſlauery: yea, ſo often had the Germans preuailed in warre vpon the Gaules, that the Gaules (who had ſometimes beene the better Souldiers) did hold themſelues no way equall to thoſe daily Inuaders. Had France beene ſo prepared vnto our Engliſh Kings, Rome it ſelfe, by this time, and long ere this time, would haue beene ours. But when King Edward the third beganne his warre vpon France, he found the whole Countrie setled in obedience to one mightie King; a King whose reputation abroad, was no lesse than his puissance at home; vnder whose Ensigne, the King of Bohemia did serue in person; at whose call, the Genowayes, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take armes: finally, a King, vnto whom one [a] Prince gaue away his Dominion, for loue; [b] another sold away a goodly Citie and Territorie for money. The Countrie lying so open to the Roman, and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who preuailed most therein (for it were meere vanitie, to match the English purchases, with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gaue the greater proofe of militarie vertue. Cæsar himselfe doth witnesse, that the Gaules complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of warre, and that their owne hardinesse was ouer-maistered, by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of batterie, raised and planted against their wals, as more than humane workes. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Roman; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any vnder the skie, are commonly put to the worse, by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to haue regard, of the great difficultie that was found, in drawing all the Gaules, or any great part of them, to one head, that with ioynt forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficultie, of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were neuer able to make vse of opportunitie: but sometimes compelled to stay for their fellowes; and sometimes driuen, to giue or take battaile, vpon extreame disaduantages, for feare, least their Companies should fall asunder: as in deede, vpon any little disaster, they were ready to beake, and returne euery one to the defence of his owne. All this, and (which was little lesse than all this) great oddes in weapon, gaue to the Romans, the honour of many gallant victories. What such helpe? or what other worldly helpe, than the golden mettall of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of Warre? Yea, did they not thinke themselues therein our superiours? Were they not in armes, in horse, and in all prouision, exceedingly beyond vs? Let vs heare, what a French writer saith, of the inequalitie that was betweene the French and English, when their King John was ready to giue the on-set, vpon the Blacke Prince, at the battaile of Poitiers. Iohn had all aduantages ouer Edward, both of number, force, shew, Countrie, and conceit, (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall, the choise of all his horse-men (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. And what could he more?

IEAN auoit tout l'auantage par dessus EDOVARD, le nombre, la force, le lustre, le pays, le preuuue (qui n'est pas communement vne consideratiõ de peu d'importance aux affaires du mõde) & auec soi l'elite de sa Cauallerie, lors estimee la meilleure de tout son Royaume.

I thinke, it would trouble a Roman antiquarie, to finde the like example in their Histories; the example, I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Armie of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with fortie thousand, better appointed, and no lesse expert warriours. This I am sure of; that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of halfe Scullions, as Liuie rightly tearmes them, nor those cowardly Kings Perseus and Gentius, are worthy patternes. All that haue read of Cressie and Agincourt, will beare me witnesse, that I doe not alleadge the battaile of Poitiers, for lacke of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proofe whereof hath left many a hundred better markes, in all quarters of France, than euer did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Crosse-bow: my answere is ready; That in all these respects, it is also (being drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more vse. The Gunne, and the Crosse-bow, are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weakenesse, or sickenesse, or a sore finger, makes the Long-Bow vnseruiceable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blanck: and so shall he perceiue, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battaile. This takes away all obiection: for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most can be deliuered before they close. Neither is it in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinarie arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then then came it to passe, that the English wan so many great battailes, hauing no aduantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestie, referre him to the French Historian: who relating the victory of our men at Creuant, where they passed a bridge, in face of the enemy, vseth these words: The English comes with a conquering brauery, as he, that was accustomed to gaine euery where, without any stay: he forceth our garde, placed vpon the bridge, to keepe the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Authour, where he tels, how the Britons, being inuaded by Charles the eighth, King of France, thought it good policie, to apparell a thousand and fiue hundred of their owne men in English Cassocks; hoping that the very sight of the English red Crosse, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Æmylius, report wonders of our Nation:) the propositi-on which first I vndertooke to maintaine; That the militarie vertue of the English, preuailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of Romans, which was assisted with all aduantages that could be desired. If it be demanded; why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Cæsar had done? my answere may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Æacidæ, of whom the old Poet Ennius gaue this note; Bellipotentes sunt magè quàm sapienti potentes; They were more warlike than politique. Who so notes their proceedings, may finde that none of them went to worke like a Conquerour: saue onely King Henrie the fift, the course of whose victories, it pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaule, before the time of Cæsar? why not after the Macedonian warre? why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantian? At all these times they had good leisure: and then especially had they both leisure, and fit opportunitie, when vnder the conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the Countrie of Gaule had been pitiously wasted. Surely, the words of Tullie were true; that with other Nations, the Romans fought for Dominion, with the Gaules, for preseruation of their owne safetie. Iohn de Serres.

Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaule, vntill they were Lords of all other Countries, to them knowne. We on the other side, held onely the one halfe of our owne Iland; the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation, (vnlesse perhaps in wealth and numbers of men somewhat inferiour) euery way equall to our selues; a Nation anciently and strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard, enemy to vs. So that our danger lay both before and behinde vs: and the greater danger at our backes; where commonly we felt, alwayes we feared, a stronger inuasion by land, than we could make vpon France, transporting our forces ouer Sea.

It is vsuall, with men, that haue pleased themselues, in admiring the matters which they finde in ancient Histories; to hold it a great iniurie done to their iudgement, if any take vpon him, by way of comparison, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perswaded, that as the diuided vertue of this our Iland, hath giuen more noble proofe of it selfe; than vnder so worthy a Leader, that Roman Armie could doe, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cæsar a Monarch; so hereafter, by Gods blessing, who hath conuerted our greatest hindrance, into our greatest helpe, the enemy that shall dare to trie our forces, will finde cause to wish, that auoiding vs, he had rather encountred as great a puissance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying a-side comparisons, we returne to the rehearsall of deeds done: wherein we shall finde, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italie, to striue with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punicke warre.

§. II.

The estate of Carthage, before it entred into warre with Rome.

THE Citie of Carthage had stood aboue sixe hundred yeares, when first it began to contend with Rome, for the mastrie of Sicil. It forewent Rome one hundred and fiftie yeeres in antiquity of foundation: but in the honour of great atchieuements, it excelled farre beyond this aduantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion Africa it selfe, from the west part of Cyrene, to the streights of Hercules, about one thousand and fiue hundred miles in length, wherein stood three hundred Cities. It had subiected all Spaine, euen to the Pyrenæan Mountaines, together with all the Hands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the west of Sicill; and of Sicill, the better part. It flourished about seuen hundred and thirty yeeres, before the destruction thereof by Scipio: who besides other spoyles, and all that the Souldiers reserued, carried thence foure hundred and seuenty thousand weight of siluer, which make of our monie (if our pounds differ not) foureteene hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious Citie ran the same fortune, which many other great ones haue done, both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the world, fore-shewes the dissolution of the whole.

a In Pol. Arist. l. 2. c. 9.

About one hundred yeares after such time as it was cast downe, the Senate of Rome caused it to be rebuilt: and by Gracchus it was called Iunonia: it was againe and againe abandoned and repeopled, taken and retaken; by Gensericus the Vandal, by Belisarius vnder Iustinian, by the Persians, by the Ægyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The seat thereof was exceeding strong: and, while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, inuincible. For the Sea compassed it about, sauing that it was tied to the maine by a necke of land; which passage had two mile and more of breadth (Appian saith, three mile, and one furlong) by which we may be induced, to beleeue the common report, that the Citie it selfe was aboue twenty miles in compasse; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to haue beene twice as great.

b The Turkes, at this day, doe also take the one halfe of the poore mans corne, that labors the earth; yea, they take tribute both of the bodies, and of the soules of the Christians their Vassals, by bereauing them of their ablest childrē, and bringing them vp in the Mahometan Religion. The Irish take the fourth sheafe; and were wōt to eate vp with their horsemen, footmen, and dogges, what they pleased, of the other three parts remaining. The husbandman and the yeoman of England, are the freest of all the World: And reason good; for of them haue the bodies of our victorious armies been compoūded. And it is the freeman, and not the slaue, that hath courage and the sense of shame deserued by cowardise. How free the English yeomē haue beene, in times, not long since past, Fortescue hath shewed in his praise of our Coūtries laws. But I may say, that they are more free now than euer: and our Nobilitie and Gentrie more seruile. For since the excessiue bravery, and vaine expence of our Grandes, hath taught them to raise their Rents; since by Inclosures, and dismembring of Mannours, the Court Baron, and the Court Leet, the Principalities of the Gentrie of England, haue beene dissolued, the Tenants, hauing payed vnto their Lords their racke Rent, owe them now no seruice at all, and (perchance) a little loue.

It had three wals, without the wall of the Citie; and betweene each of those, three or foure streets, with vaults vnder ground, of thirty foot deepe, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food: ouer these they had stables for foure thousand horse, and Granaries for their prouender. They had also lodgings in these streets, betweene these out-walles for foure thousand horse-men, and twentie thousand foot-men, which (according to the discipline vsed now by those of China) neuer pestered the Citie. It had towards the South part, the Castle of Byrsa; to which Seruius giues two and twentie furlongs in compasse, that make two mile and a halfe. This was the same piece of ground, which Dido obtained of the Libyans, when she got leaue to buy onely so much Land of them, as she could compasse with an Oxe hide. On the west side it had also the salt Sea, but in the nature of a standing poole; for a certaine arme of Land, fastned to the ground, on which the Citie stood, stretched it selfe towards the west continent, and left but seauentie foot open for the Sea to enter. Ouer this standing Sea was built a most sumptuous Arsenall, hauing their ships and gallies riding vnder it.

The forme of their Common weale resembled that of Sparta; for they had titularie Kings, and the Aristocraticall power of Senators. But (as Regius well obserueth) the people in later times vsurped too great authoritie in their Councels. This confusion in gouernement, together with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruine, were their auarice and their cruelty. a Their auarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinary tributes) the one b halfe of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not vpon gentle and mercifull persons, but vpon those who could best tyrannize ouer the people, to augment their treasures. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercy, that had offended through ignorance: the one of these rendred them odious to their vassals, whom it made ready, vpon all occasions to reuolt from them: the other did breake the spirits of their Generals, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the feare of a cruell death at home. Hereby it came to passe, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian forces, after some great losse receiued, haue desperately cast thēselues with all that remained vnder their charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessary, either to repaire their losses quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them haue dared, to manage their owne best proiects, after that good forme, wherein they first conceiued them, for feare lest the manner of their proceeding should be misinterpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucifie, not onely the vnhappy Captaine, but euen him, whose bad counsaile had prosperous euent. The faults, wherewith, in generall, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I finde to be these; lust, cruelty, auarice, craft, vnfaithfulnesse, and periurie. Whether the Romans themselues were free from the same crimes, let the triall bee referred vnto their actions. The first league betweene Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: hauing beene made, the yeare following the expulsion of Tarquine. In that league, the Carthaginians had the superioritie, as imposing vpon the Romans, the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as haue trade, in some part of Africk, nor suffer any shippe of theirs to passe beyond the headland, or cape, then called the faire Promontorie, vnlesse it were by force of tempest: whereas on the other side, no Hauen in Italie was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made long after, which (howsoeuer it hath pleased * Liuie to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreatie) was more strict then the former: prohibiting the Romanes to haue trade in any part of Africa, or in the Iland of Sardinia. * Liu. Dec. 1. l. 7.

By these two treaties, it may appeare that the Carthaginians had an intent not onely to keepe the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge of the state of Africk; but to countenance & vphold them, in their troubling all Italie, whereby they themselues might haue the better meanes to occupie all Sicill, whilest that Iland should be destitute of Italian succours. Heereupon we finde good cause, of the ioy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twenty and fiue pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were ouerthrowne. But the little state of Rome preuailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicill. For that mighty Armie, of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicil, wanne onely two Cities therein: many great fleets were deuoured by tempests; and howsoeuer the Carthaginians preuailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their owne valour, or by the assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their owne losses, & take reuenge vpon those Inuaders. But neuer were the people of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicill, then when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Iland in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible, for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilest the Carthaginians were busie, in making their aduantage, of this good opportunitie; Pyrrhus, inuited by the Tarentines, and their fellowes, came into Italie, where he made sharp warre vpon the Romans. These newes were vnpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtile Nation, easily foresaw, that the same busie disposition, which had brought this Prince, out of Greece into Italie, would as easily transport him ouer into Sicill, as soone as he could finish his Roman warre. To preuent this danger, they sent Mago Embassador to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were sorry to heare, what misaduenture had befallen the Romans, their good friends, in this warre with Pyrrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by sending an Army into Italie; if their helpe were thought needfull, against the Epirots. Xenoph. Grec. hist. l. 1.

It was indeed, the maine desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his worke in Italie, that they might at good leysure, pursue their businesse in Sicill: which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high-minded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seeme vnable to stand by their owne strength. Yet the message was taken louingly, as it ought; and the former league betweene Rome and Carthage renued, with couenants added, concerning the present businesse; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be with reseruation of liberty, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should inuade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, vsing all meanes to sound his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one vpon euery new occasion changeth his owne purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a steppe into Sicill: where, though in fine hee was neither getter nor sauer, yet hee cleane defeated the purposes of Carthage, leauing them at his departure from thence, as farre from any end, as when they first began.

So many disasters, in an enterprise, that from the first vndertaking had bin so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well haue induced the Carthaginians to beleeue, that an higher prouidence resisted their intendment. But their desire, of winning that fruitfull Iland, was so inueterate; that with vnwearied patience, they still continued in hope, of so much the greater an harueſt, by how much their cost & paines therein buried had beene the more. Wherfore they re-continued their former courses; and and by force or practice, recouered in few yeeres, all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Iland, that so they might the better enable themselues to deale with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had serued vnder Agathocles, being entertained within Messana as friends, & finding themselues too strong for the Citizens, tooke aduantage of the power that they had to doe wrong; and with perfidious crueltie, slew those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wiues, of those, whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselues Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that meere desperation, of finding any that would approoue their barbarous treachery, added rage vnto their stoutnesse. Hauing therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they ouer-ranne all the Countrie round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not onely defend Messana against the Cities of Sicil Confederate; to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but they rather wan vpon them, yea, and vpon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbor places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her backe to these Mamertines, the Syracusians wan fast vpon them, and finally, confining them within the walls of Messana, they also with a powerfull Armie besieged the Citie. It hapned ill, that about the same time, a contention began, betweene the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Gouernors of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Armie elected two Gouernours among themselues; to wit, Artemidorus & Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, beeing for his yeeres excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrary to the policie of that State, to approue any election made by the Souldiers, yet for the great clemencie hee vsed at his first entrance, was by generall consent established and made Gouernour. This Office, hee rather vsed as a Scale, thereby to clime to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preferment.

In briefe, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie; and somewhat without it, that gaue impediment, to his obtaining, and safe keeping, of the place he sought; to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and certaine mutinous troups of Souldiers without, often and easily mooued to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, hee tooke to wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authoritie among the Syracusians. For the second, leading out the Armie to besiege Messana, hee quartered all those Companies, which hee held suspected, on the one side of the Citie, and leading the rest of his horse and foot vnto the other side, as if he would haue assaulted it in two seuerall parts, he marched away vnder the couert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the affieged: So returning home, and leauying an Armie of his owne Citizens, well trayned and obedient, he hasted againe towards Messana, & was by the Mamertines (growne proud by their former victorie ouer the Mutiners) incountred in the plaines of Mylaum, where hee obtained a most signall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captiue into Syracuse, himselfe by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselues vtterly infeebled, some of them resolued to giue themselues to the Carthaginians, others to craue assistance of the Romans: to each of whom, the seuerall factions dispatched Embassadours for the very same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soone ready to lay hold vpon the good offer: so that a Captaine of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, whereof they that had sent for him gaue him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doores, and the Towne reserued for other Masters.

These newes did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captaine, as both a Traitour and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Armie to besiege Messana, as a Towne that rebelled, hauing once beene theirs. Hieron, the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of iniuries lately receiued) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entred into a league, for exterminating the

Mamertines

Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all sides were closed vp within Messena: the Carthaginians lying with a Nauie at Sea, and with an Armie on the one side of the Towne, whilest Hieron with his Syracusians, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger, came Appius Claudius the Roman Consull, with an Armie to the streights of Sicil: which passing by night with notable audacitie, hee put himselfe into the Towne, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying vnto them, that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore hee was come to giue them protection, euen by force of warre, if reason would not preuaile.

This message was vtterly neglected; And so beganne the warre betweene Rome and Carthage; wherein, it will then bee time to shew, on which part was the iustice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romanes lately foregoing this, haue beene first considered.

§. III.

The beginning of the first Punick warre. That it was vniustly vndertaken by the Romanes.

WHen Pyrrhus beganne his warres in Italie, the Citie of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not onely fearing to bee taken by the Epirot, but much more distrusting the Carthaginians, as likely to seize vpon it in that busie time, sought aide from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of 4. thousand Souldiers, vnder the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leisure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messana, (a Citie in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise diuided than by a narrow Sea, which seuereth it from Italie) and rather weighing the greatnesse of the bootie, than the odiousnesse of the villanie, by which it was gotten; resolued finally, to make the like purchace, by taking the like wicked course. Confederating therefore themselues with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; diuiding the spoile, and all which that State had, among themselues.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more seuere profession of iustice, than they did, during all the time of their growing greatnes) resolued, after a while, to take reuenge vpon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italie by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulenesse of their fact, hopelesse of pardon) defended themselues with an obstinate resolution: yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present furie, were brought bound to Rome, where after the vsuall torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Countrie, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders; and the people of Rhegium were againe restored to their former libertie and estates.

This execution of Iustice being newly performed, and the fame thereof sounding honourably through all quarters of Italie: messengers came to Rome, from Messana, desiring helpe against the Carthaginians, and Syracusians, that were in a readinesse to inflict the like punishment vpon the Mamertines, for the like offence. A very impudent request it was, which they made: who hauing both giuen example of that villanie to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with ioint forces to make it good, doe intreat the Iudges to giue them that assistance, which they were wont to receiue from their fellow-theeues.

The Romans could not suddenly resolue, whether the way of honestie or of profit, were to be followed; they euermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrary the course of succouring the Mamertines was to their former counsells, and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put to torment, and to the sword, their owne Souldiers, and restored the oppressed to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best part of Africa, of the Mediterran Ilands, of a great part of Spaine, and some part of Sicill it selfe; whilest also they feared, that Syracuse therein therein seated (a Citie in beauty and riches, little, at that time, inferiour to Carthage, and farre superiour to Rome it selfe) might become theirs; the safetie of their owne estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driuen to despaire by the Romani) should deliuer vp Messana, with those other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand betweene Carthage, and the Lordship of Sicil: for Syracuse it selfe could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians, that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten vpon that passage from the maine Land. It was further considered; that the opportunite of Messana was such, as would not onelie debarre, all succours out of the continent, from arriuall in Sicil; but would serue as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might haue entrance into Italie, at their owne pleasure.

These considerations, of profit at hand, and of preuenting dangers, that threatned from a-farre, did so preuaile, aboue all regard of honestie, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacie with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consull, presently dispatcht away from Messana: into which he entred, and vnder-tooke the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arriuall; and lesse moued, with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him in number of men; The whole Iland was ready to relieue them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Appius himselfe well vnderstood: and against all this he thought the stiffe mettall of his Roman Souldier, a sufficient remedie. Therefore, hee resolued to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his comming was to send them away from the Towne, not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficial to him, that the enemie lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieue another in distresse. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his owne mutinous followers, not long before: onely he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by vnexpected sallie, to surprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith hee presented him. The Syracusian wanted not courage to fight; but surely, he wanted good aduice: else would he not haue hazarded all his power against an enemie, of whom he had made no triall; when it had beene easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that hee thought to get honor, wherewith to adorn the beginning of his reigne. But he was well beaten, and driuen to saue himselfe within his Trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisedome, that stood him and his Kingdom in good stead, all the daies of his life. It was a foolish desire of reuenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana beene taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it selfe must haue sought help from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mightie Cities) but a small stocke, which it behooued him to gouerne well: such another losse would haue made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake vp his Campe, and retired home: intending to let them stand to their aduentures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargaine. The next day, Claudius perceiuing the Sicilian Armie gone, did with great courage, and with much alacritie of his souldiers, giue charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemie forsooke both field and campe, leauing all the Countrie open to the Romans; who hauing spoyled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege vnto the great City of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoeuer they animated the Romanes, and filled them with hopes, of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour in the Citie of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost, than what had beene prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspition of Warre from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this warre; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honestie (for questionlesse the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to to their shame) but how allowable in strict tearmes of lawfulnesse; whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themſelues, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, diſtreſſed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde, how the meſſengers of thoſe folke, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could bee enabled to make any ſuch ſurrendrie, in the publike name of all.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull ſurrendrie of themſelues and their poſſeſſions, were become ſubiect vnto Rome, by what better title could the Romans aſſiſt the Mamertines, againſt their moſt ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might haue aided the Campanes, againſt the Samnites, without the ſame condition? which was (as they themſelues confeſſed) by none at all. But let it be ſuppoſed, that ſome point ſeruing to cleare this doubt, is loſt in all Hiſtories. Doubtleſſe it is, that no company of Pyrates, Theeues, Out-lawes, Murderers, or ſuch other malefactours, can by any good ſucceſſe of their villanie, obtaine the priuiledge of ciuill ſocieties, to make league or truce, yea, or to require faire warre: but are by all meanes, as moſt pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of ſome Ciuilians; that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith with one of theſe; it were a Poſition of ill conſequence: This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can giue protection to ſuch as theſe, as long as any other is vſing the ſword of vengeance againſt them, without becomming acceſſary to their crimes. Wherefore, we may eſteeme this action of the Romanes, ſo farre from being iuſtifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwiſe, by admitting this neſt of Murderers and Theeues, into their protection, they iuſtly deſerued to be warred vpon themſelues, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Meſſana had been taken, and the Mamertines all ſlaine, ere any newes of the Confederacie had beene brought vnto the beſiegers. The great Alexander was ſo farre perſwaded heerein; that hee did put to ſword all the Branchiadæ (a people in Sogdiana) and rized their Citie, notwithanding that they ioyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; becauſe they were deſcended from a Companie of Mileſians, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and Countrie, which theſe of their poſteritie enioyed. Neuertheleſſe, in courſe of humane iuſtice, long and peaceable poſſeſſion giues ius acquiſitum, a kinde of right by preſcription, vnto that which was firſt obtained by wicked meanes: and doth free the deſcendants, from the crime of their Anceſtors, whoſe vilanies they doe not exerciſe. But that the ſame generation of Theeues, which by a deteſtable fact hath purchaſed a rich Towne, ſhould be acknowledged a lawfull companie of Citizens, there is no ſhew of right. For euen the Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by thoſe victories which gaue him firſt poſſeſſion: but length of time is requiſite, to eſtabliſh him, vnleſſe by ſome alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claime; as did our King Henrie the firſt, by his marriage with Maude, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Ironſide. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had ſo good) of iuſtice, in this quarrell, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the warres that they made vpon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her ſelfe, in the time of her viſitation, was burnt to the ground.

Of the Iland of Sicil.

†. I.
The qualitie of the Iland: and the firſt inhabitants thereof.

THe defence of the Mamertines, or the poſſeſſion of Meſſana, being now no longer, ſince the firſt victories of Appius Claudius, the obiects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage, are about to contend: it will bee agreeable vnto the order, which in the like caſes wee haue obſerued, to make a briefe collection, of things, concerning that noble Iland, which hath beene the ſtage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this preſent Warre.

That

That Sicil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Isle, adioyned to Italie, as a part of Bruttum in Calabria, neere vnto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest seuered from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this diuision happened, there is no memoriall remaining, in any ancient writer. Strabo, Plin. and Dionysius, affirme, that it was caused by an earthquake; Silius and Cassiodorus, doe thinke it to haue beene done by the rage and violence of the tide, and surges of the Sea. Plin. l. 2 c. 91. Sil. l. 5.

Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Eubœa seuered from Bœotia; Cataluna and Macris, from Eubœa; Sillie here in England, from the Cape of Cornwall; and Britaine it selfe (as may seeme by Verstegans arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, they which lend their eares to fables, doe attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Eustathius witnesseth) who with his three-forked Mace, in fauour of Iocastus, the sonne of Æolus, diuided it from the maine land, and so made it an Iland, which before was but a Demie Isle; that by that meanes, he might the more safely inhabite, and possesse the same. Diodorus Siculus, moued by the authoritie of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of sundring it from Italie, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the rocks and mountains) first opened the Sicilian streights, as Hercules did those of Gibralter. Orion. l. 4. c. 14 Diod. l. 6. Ouid de Fast 4

They which value the Ilands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greatest, as Eustathius and Strabo, who affirme this, not only to excell the rest for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soyle. As concerning the forme of this Iland, Pomponius Mela saith, it is like that Capitall letter of the Greeke, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally knowne to be true. That the whole Iland was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina, all old writers with one consent affirme. To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of setting and sowing of Corne: to Proserpina, not so much, for that she was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plutarch and Diodorus do report for truth) that Pluto, as soone as she, vncouering her selfe, first shewed her selfe to bee seene of him, gaue her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertilitie and riches of this Countrie, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where hee saith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granarie, and Store-house of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar sort. The same Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not onely the store-house of the people of Rome: but also that it was a well-furnished treasurie. For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he) it hath vsually cloathed, maintained, and furnished, our greatest Armies, with leather, apparell, and corne. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. Whatsoeuer Sicilie doth yeeld (saith Solinus) whether by the Sunne, and temperature of the aire, or by the industrie and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that are of best estimation: were it not that such things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extreamely ouer-growne with saffron. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the fields neere vnto Leontium, and in diuers other places of this Iland, wheat doth grow of it selfe without any labour, or looking to of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it sixe Colonies, and sixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, wherof the names are found scatteringly in many good Authors. Strabo l. 6.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Iland, as well in peace as warre; there be many other things, which haue made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the rauishing of Proserpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Ætna, Scylla & Charybdis, with other antiquities, and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes, the famous Geometrician Euclides; the painfull Historian Diodorus; and Empedocles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Lastrioganes, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and vnciuill; all histories and fables doe ioyntly with one consent auerre. Yet Thucydides saith, that these sauage people dwelt onely in one part of the Iland. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bredde in the Isle (although some doe thinke,) Thucydides and Diodorus doe very constantly auouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were inuaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driuen by the Pelasgi from their owne seates, and finding no place vpon the Continent, which they were able to master maſter and inhabite, paſſed ouer into this Iland, three hundred yeeres before the Greekes ſent any Colonies thither: and (ſaith Philiſtus) eighty yeres before the fall of Troy. Theſe Siculi gaue the name of Sicilia, to the Iland; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the Eaſt and Northerne part thereof, into the Weſt and South. At their landing, they firſt built the Citie Zancle, afterward called Meſſena; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syracuſe it ſelfe, beating from thence the Ætolians, who long before had ſet vp a Towne in that place. As for the name of Syracuſe, it was not known, till ſuch time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the Iland from the Siculs; Neither did the Siculi at their firſt arriuall diſpoſſeſſe the Ætolians thereof, but ſome hundred yeeres after their deſcent, and after ſuch time as they had founded the Cities before named; with Nea, Hybla, Trynacia, and diuers others.

After theſe Siculi came another Nation out of Italy, called Morgetes; who were thence driuen by the Oenotrians. Theſe ſate downe in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raiſed the Cities of Morgentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were diuided, and by a ciuill war greatly infeebled. Among theſe ancient ſtories, we finde the laſt voiage, and the death of Minos, King of Creet. Thucydides, an Hiſtorian of vnqueſtionable ſinceritie, reports of Minos, that he made conqueſt of many Ilands: and ſome ſuch buſineſſe, perhaps drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in purſuit of Dædalus. The tale goes thus: Dædalus fleeing the reuenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and during his abode there, he built a place of great ſtrength, neere vnto Megara, for Cocalus, to lay vp his treaſure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the reſt, he caſt a Ramme in gold, that was ſet vp in the Temple of Venus Erycina; which hee did with ſo great Art, as thoſe that beheld it, thought it rather to be liuing, than counterfait.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dædalus, prepares to inuade the Territorie of Cocalus; but when he was arriued, Cocalus doubting his owne ſtrength, promiſeth to deliuer Dædalus. This he performes not, but in the meane while, kills Minos by treaſon, and perſwades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabite a part of Sicil; the better (as it ſeems) to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt the Siculi. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gaue their conſent, and builded for themſelues the Citie of Minoa, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewiſe built the Towne of Engium, now called Gange: and theſe were the firſt Cities, built by the Greekes in Sicil, about two ages before the warre of Troy; for the grand-children of Minos ſerued with the Greekes at the ſiege thereof.

But after ſuch time as the Cretans vnderſtood, that their King had by treaſon beene made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to inuade Cocalus: and landing neere vnto Camicus, they beſieged the ſame fiue yeares, but in vaine. In the end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coaſt of Italie; and hauing no meanes to repaire their ſhips, nor the honour they had loſt, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, betweene the two famous Ports of Brunduſium and Tarentum. Of theſe Cretans came thoſe Nations, afterward called Iapyges and Meſſapij.

After the taking of Troy, Ægeſtus and Elymus, brought with them certaine troops into Sicil, and ſeated themſelues among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Ægeſta and Elyma.

It is ſaid, that Æneas viſited theſe places in his paſſage into Italie: and that ſome of the Troianes, his followers, were left behinde him, in theſe Townes of Sicil: whereof there want not good Authors, that make Æneas himſelfe the founder.

About the ſame time, the Phœnicians ſeized vpon the Promontories of Pachinus, and Lilybæum, and vpon certaine ſmall Iſles adioyning to the maine Iland: which they fortified, to ſecure the trades that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals haue done in the Eaſt India, at Goa, Ormus, Moſambig, and other places. But the Phœnicians ſtaied not there; for after they had once aſſured their deſcents, they built the goodly Citie of Panormus, now called Palerma.

Theſe we finde, were the Nations that inhabited the Iſle of Sicil, before the warre of Troy, and ere the Greekes in any numbers began to ſtraggle in thoſe parts.

It may perchance ſeeme ſtrange to the Reader, that in all ancient ſtorie, hee findes one and the same beginning of Nations, after the floud; and that the first planters of all parts of the World, were said to be mighty and Giant-like men; and that, as Phœnicia, Ægypt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Oreſtes, Antæus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmarke had Starchaterus, remembred by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, and other Regions, had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Isle of Sicil had her Leſtrigones and Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reiect for fained and fabulous; did not Moſes make vs know, that the Zamzummins, Emims, Anakims, and Og of Baſan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Desarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not, that Tertullian, S. Auguſtine, Nicephorus, Procopius, Iſidore, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many other Authors, haue confirmed the opinion. Yea, Veſputius, in his second Nauigation into America, hath reported, that himselfe hath seene the like men in those parts. Againe, whereas the selfe-same is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their simplicitie of life, their meane fare, their feeding on acorns and rootes, their poore cottages, the couering of their bodies with the skins of beasts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, & their warfare, their first passages ouer great Riuers & armes of the Sea, vpon rafts of trees tied together; and afterward, their making boats, first, of twigs and leather, then of wood; first, with Oares, & then with saile; that they esteemed as gods, the first finders out of Arts; as of Husbandrie, of Lawes, and of Policie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all liued in the same newnesse of time, which we call Old time, and had all the same want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankinde. For other teaching had they none, that were remooued farre off from the Hebrewes, (who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs,) than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophie Naturall, as the morall did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from crueltie and oppression.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For wee haue now greater Giants, for vice and iniustice, than the World had in those daies, for bodily strength; for cottages, and houses of clay and Timber, we haue raised Palaces of stone; we carue them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold; insomuch as men are rather knowne by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkennesse; from the couering of our bodies with the skinnes of beasts, not onely to silke and gold, but to the very skinnes of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take reuenge of the excesse, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longior & auxit, longiſſima ſubruet; Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time, longer than the rest, shall ouerthrow it.

* Syracuſe, as Cicero relates, was the greatest, and most goodly Citie of all that the Greeks possest. For the situation is both strong, and of an excellent prospect from euery entrance, by Land, or sea. The Port was (for the most part) enuironed with beautiful building: and that part which was without the City, was on both sides bankt vp, and sustained with beautiful wals of Marble. The Citie it selfe was one of the greatest of the World: for it had in compasse (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, 180. furlongs; which made of our miles about 18. It was compoũded of foure Cities, (Strabo saith, of fiue) to wit, Inſula, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis: of which greatnesse, the ruines & foundations of the walls doe yet witnesse.

†. II.

The plantation of the Greekes in Sicill.

WHen the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: it happened, that one Theocles, a Greeke, being driuen vpon that coast by an Easterly wind; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had beene thought fabulous, being deliuered onely by Poets; gaue information to the Athenians of this his discouerie, & proposed vnto them the benefit of this easie conquest, offering to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the Engliſh. Wherfore he took the same course that Columbus afterwards did. He ouer-laboured not himselfe in perswading the Noble Athenians (who thought themselues to be well enough already) to their owne profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and industrious, by whom his proiect was gladly entertained. By these was built the Citie of Naxus, and a Colony planted of Eubœans.

But the rest of the Greekes were wiser than our westerne Princes of Europe: for they had no Pope, that should forbid them, to occupie the voide places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubœans, and landed in Sicil, neare vnto that Citie, called afterward * Syracuſe: of which, that part onely was then compassed with a wall, which the Æolians

Aeolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Naxos; the Latines, Insula. He with his Corinthians hauing ouer-come the Siculi, draue them vp into the Countrie; and after a few yeares, their multitudes increasing, they added vnto the Citie of the Iland, that of Acrae, Tycha, and Neapolis. So as well by the commoditie of the double Port, capable of as many ships, as any Hauen of that part of Europe, as by the fertilitie of the soyle; Syracuse grew vp in great haste, to be one of the goodliest Towns of the world. In short time the Greekes did possesse the better part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselues into the fast and mountainous parts of the Iland, making their Royall residence in Trinacia.

After such time as the Dores of Peloponnesus had driue out the Sicilians, this goodly citie for a long time became the seat of Tyrants. The first whereof was Gelo: The second, Hiero the elder: the third Thrasybulus: the fourth and fift, Dionysius, the elder, and yonger: the fixt Dion: the seuenth Agathocles: the eight, Pyrrhus: the ninth, Hiero the yonger: the tenth and last, Hieronymus: who beeing slaine at Leontium, at length the Romans conquered it vnder the conduct of Marcellus.

Some seuen yeeres after the arriuall of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by the successe of the Corinthians, did assaile, and obtaine the Citie of Leontium, built and possest by the Siculi. In briefe, the Greekes winne from the Siculi, and their Associates, the Cities of Catana and Hybla, which, in honour of the Megarians that forc't it, they called Megara.

About 45. yeeres after Archias had taken Syracuse; Antiphemus and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Armie into Sicil, and built Gela; whose Citizens, one hundred and eight yeeres after, did erect that magnificent and renowned Citie of Agrigentum, gouerned according to the Lawes of the Dorians.

The Syracusians also, in the seuentieth yere after their plantation, did set vp the City of Acra, in the Mountaines; and in the ninetieth yere Casmena, in the Playnes adioyning; and againe, in the hundred and thirtieth yeare of their dwelling in Syracuse, they built Camerina; and soon after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Iland. So did the Cumani, about the same time, recouer from the Siculs the Citie of Zancle, which they had founded in the streight betweene Sicil and Italie. They of Zancle had beene the founders of Himera.

Not long after this Doriæus the Lacedæmonian built Heraclia; which the Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, soone after inuaded and ruined, though the same were againe ere long re-edified.

Selinus also was built by a Colonie of Megara: and Zancle was taken by the Messenians; who hauing lost their owne Countrie, gaue the name thereof vnto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest Cities in this Iland.

†. III.

Of the gouernment and affaires of Sicil, before Dionysius his Tyrannie.

THe most part of the Cities in Sicil, were gouerned by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris began to vsurpe the state of Agrigentum, and to exercise all manner of tyrannie therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a detestable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of brasse, wherein to enclose men, and scortch them to death: praysing the deuice with this commendation; That the noise of one tormented therein, should bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a due reward to the Inuentour; by causing the first triall to be made vpon himselfe. He reigned one and thirty yeares, saith Eusebius; others giue him but sixteene: Howsoeuer it were, one Telemachus in the end, fell vpon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and stoned him to death; beeing thereto animated by Zeno, euen whilest the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, to make him confesse some matter of conspiracie.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recouered their libertie, and enioyed it long, till Thero vsurped the gouernment of the Common-weale: at which time also Panetius made himselfe Lord of Leontium; and Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, hauing ruled 7. yeares, was slaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hippocrates succeeded in his roome, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle or Messena, and of Leontium; whom with diuers others of the ancient inhabitants, hee forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made warre with the Syracusians, and, in the end, got from them by composition, the Citie of Camerina. But when he had reigned seuen yeares, he was slaine in a battell against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their forme of Gouernment, from Popular to Aristocraticall; a preparation towards a Principality, wherinto it was soon after changed.

After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greekes, seated themselues in Sicil) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former warre, with notable successe, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed vnto him by Hippocrates ouer his children, and being in possession of Gela, tooke the occasion and aduantage of a contention in Syracuse, betweene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Armie to the succour of the Gouernours, driuen out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeed) the most famous, that Pausan. l. 6. euer gouerned the Syracusians. This change happened in the second yeere of the three-score and twelfth Olympiad; wherein the better to establish himselfe, he tooke to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also vsurped the state of Agrigentum.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasibulus: to the first of which he gaue vp the Citie of Gela, when hee had obtained the Principalitie of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts trauelled in the strengning, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Megarians that had moued a warre against him, he ouer-came; the richer sort hee brought vnto Syracuse; and the people hee sold for slaues. In like manner dealt hee with other places vpon the like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentines, hauing dispossest Terillus, of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Messena, Father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon was also sollicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after diuers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilcar, Herod. & Dio. were ouerthrowne by Gelon: and an hundred and fiftie thousand of them left their bodies in Sicil.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedæmonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Armie past the Hellespont. He, for their reliefe hauing armed thirty thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused neuertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So hee vsed to their Embassadors onely this saying, That their Spring was withered; accompting the Armie, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greeke Nation.

The Carthaginians, after this great losse receiued, fearing the inuasion of their owne Countrie, sent to Gelon by their Embassadours, to desire peace; who grants it them on these conditions; That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their children to Saturne; That they should pay him 2000. talents of siluer, and present him with two armed ships, in signe of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not onely willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for warre, they sent vnto Demarata, Gelons wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended; and Sicil in peace; Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, and erected others in honour of them. So beeing exceedingly beloued and honoured of his Subiects, he left the World, and left for his Successour his brother Hiero. Philistus and Plinie report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and suffered himselfe to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded, a man rude, cruell, couetous, and so suspicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus, as hee sought by all meanes to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; by the conuersation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the studie of good Arts. Diuers quarrels he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to inuade Sicil, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Gracians, against him. Hee also ouerthrew in battaile Thrasydæus, the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrigentines, to their former libertie. But in the end, he lost the loue of the Syracusians; and after he had reigned 11. yeares, he left the kingdom to his brother Thrasybulus, who became a most vniust & bloudy Tyrant. Thrasybulus enioyed his Principalitie no longer then ten moneths. For, notwithstanding the force force of mercenary Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, hee was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acradina, he restored the gouernement, and was banished the Iland. From whence he sailed into Greece, where hee died a priuate man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusians recouered againe their former libertie, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had neuer sought, had the Successors of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principalitie of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the preseruation ought to answere the acquisition. Where a liberall, valiant, and aduised Prince, hath obtained any new Signiorie, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himselfe from being a priuate man, to the dignitie of a Prince; it behoueth the Successour to maintaine it by the same way and art, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blowes, ere that shee could cleanse her selfe of the creatures and louers of Gelon) was now againe become Mistresse of her selfe, and held her selfe free, well-neere threescore yeares, to the time of Dionysius; though she were in the meane while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne, called Tindario.

Now, to preuent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the future, they deuised a kinde of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking patterne from the Athenian Ostracisme. They called this their new deuised iudgement of exile, Petalismus, wherein euery one wrote vpon an Oliue leafe (as at Athens they wrote vpon shells) the name of him, whom hee would haue expelled the Citie. Hee that had most suffrages against him, was banished for fiue yeeres. Heere by in a short time, it came to passe that those of iudgement, and best able to gouerne the Common-weale, were by the worst able, either suppreſt, or thrust out of the Citie. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselues as secretly as they could; seeking some place of more securitie, wherein to maintaine themselues. And good reason they had so to doe; seeing that there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not very long. For their necessity taught them to abolish it, and restore againe the wiser sort vnto the Gouernment; from which, the Nobilitie hauing practised to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being inuaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had alreadie taken Enna, and some other of the Grecian Cities, and ouerthrowne the Armie of the Agregentines) the Syracusians sent forces against him, commanded by an vnworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolcon. This their Captaine made nothing so much haste to finde out Ducetius, against whom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Armie he led, as soone as Ducetius presented him battell. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those whom they had banished, they leuie other troopes; by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitteth himselfe, and is constrained to leaue the Iland for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned againe, and built the Citie Collatina on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead, all the Greeke Cities did in a sort acknowledge Syracuse: Trinacia excepted, which also by force of armes, in the foureſcore and fift Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they doe not long enioy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppreſt by them, seeke aide from the Athenians, about the sixt yeere of the Peloponnesian Warre. In this suite they preuailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, vnder the leading of Laches, and Charœodes. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by Sophocles, Bythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captaines, they inuaded the Territories of the Syracusians, and their Partisans; wanne and lost diuers places; tooke Messana; and, in the seuenth yeere of the Peloponnesian Warre, lost it againe. They also at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which did inuade each others Territorie with great violence. But when they had wearied themselues on all hands, and yet could see none issue of the warre, the Leontines, without the aduice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusians, and were admitted into their societie, with equall freedome. So the Athenians, who hoped to haue greatned themselues in Sicil, by the diuision and ciuill warre, were disappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to be gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the custome of popular Estates) by taking reuenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banished Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and layd an heauy fine vpon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the most memorable warre, that euer was made by the Greekes in Sicil: which was that of the Athenians, against the Selinuntines and Syracusians, in fauor of the Cities of Egesta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppresst the Egestans; and they of Syracuse, the Leontines, & the Catanians: which was the ground of the warre. For, the Athenians vndertooke the protection of their olde friends: and, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedæmon was sent to the Syracusians. The Lacedæmonians dealt plainely, hauing none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to helpe a people of their owne Tribe, that craued their succor, being in distresse. The Athenians scarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were so great, as discouered their intent to be none other, than the conquest of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were so blinded with their owne passions, that they would not beleeue their owne eies; which presented vnto them a Fleet, and Armie, farre greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the Citie of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding, not onely the greatnesse of the enterprise, but the necessitie of finishing it in a short space of time. For the Lacedæmonians (as hath already beene shewed in due place) stood at that time in such broken termes of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open war. Wherefore it was thought necessary, either to spare cost in this great expedition, or altogether to forbeare it: which was likely to be hindred by warres at home, if their proceedings were slacke abroad. And surely, had not the desire of the Athenians been ouerpassionate, the arguments of Nicias had caused them to abstaine from so chargeable a businesse, and to reserue their forces for a more needfull vse. But young counsailes preuailed against the authoritie of ancient men, that were more regardfull of safetie than of honour.

Of this businesse, mention hath beene alreadie made, in that which wee haue written of the Peleponnesian warre. But what was there deliuered in generall termes, as not concerning the affaires of Greece, otherwise than by consequence; doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicil was like to haue felt a great conuersion.

Though Alcibiades had preuailed against Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

These had commission & direction, as well to succour the Segestans, and to re-establish the Leontines, cast out of their places by the Syracusians; as also by force of armes, to subiect the Syracusians, and all their adherents in Sicill, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their supreame Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were sent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and fiue thousand one hundred Souldiers, besides the thirty ships of burden, which transported their victualls, engines, and other munitions for the warre: and these were Athenians, Mantineans, Eboedians, and Candians: there were, besides these, sixe thousand Megarians light armed, with thirtie horsemen. Thucyd. l. 6. c. 9.

With these troups and fleets they arriue at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to giue them entrie; but sell them victualls for their monie. From thence they sent to the Egestans, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the warre, seeing for their sakes they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answeres, that these Egestans were poore, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadors with false shewes of gold, hauing in all but 30. talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and allied vnto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their walls. Hereupon Nicias aduiseth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perswade them to an agreement with the Egestans; as likewise to see what disbursements the Egestans could make; and so returne againe into Greece, and not to waste Athens in a needlesse warre. Alcibiades, on the other side, would ſollicite the Cities of Sicil to confederacie againſt the Syracuſians and Selinuntines, where-by to force them vnto reſtitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus, he perſwades them to aſſaile Syracuſe it ſelfe, before it were prepared againſt them. But in the end (being excluded out of diuers Cities) they ſurprize Catana: and there they take new counſaile, how to proceede. Thence they imploied Nicias to thoſe of Egeſta, who receiued from them thirtie talents towards his charges; and one hundred and twentie talents more there were of the ſpoiles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the ſummer being ſpent in idle conſultations, and vaine attempts, the Athenians prepare to aſſaile Syracuſe. But Alcibiades having beene accuſed at home, in his abſence, was ſent for backe by the Athenians, to wake his anſwere: and the Armie was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. Theſe Commanders obtaine a landing place very neere vnto Syracuſe, by this deuice.

They imploy to Syracuſe an inhabitant of Catana, whom they truſt; and inſtruct him, to promiſe vnto the Syracuſians, that he would deliuer into their hands all the Athenians, within Catana. Hereupon the Syracuſians draw thitherward with their beſt forces. But in the meane while, the Athenians, ſetting ſaile from Catana, arriue at Syracuſe, where they land at faire eaſe, and fortifie themſelues againſt the Towne. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracuſians had the loſſe: but the Athenians, wanting horſe, could not purſue their victory to any great effect. They then retire themſelues, with a reſolution to refreſh their Armie at Catana, for the winter-ſeaſon. From thence they made an attempt vpon Meſſana, hoping to haue taken it by an intelligence, but in vaine. For Alcibiades had diſcouered ſuch as were Traitors within the Citie to the Meſſenians. This he now did, in deſpight of his owne Citizens, the Athenians; becauſe they had recalled him from his command, with a purpoſe either to haue put him to death, or to haue baniſhed him: whereof being aſſured by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lacedæmonians, and to them he gaue miſchieuous counſaile againſt his countrie. While this winter yet laſted, the Syracuſians ſend Embaſſadours to Lacedæmon, and Corinth, for aide: as likewiſe the Athenian Captaines in Sicil, ſend to Athens, for ſupplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth yeare of the Peloponneſian warre) the Athenians in Sicil, ſaile from the Port of Catana, to Megara, forſaken of the Inhabitants; from whence forraging the Countrie, they obtaine ſome ſmall victories ouer the ſtraggling Syracuſians: and at their returne to Catana, they receiue a ſupply of two hundred men at armes, but without horſe, which they hoped to furniſh in the Iland, from the Segeſtans, and other their adherents: they were alſo ſtrengthened with a company of Archers, and with three hundred talents in money.

Hereupon they take courage, and incampe neere Syracuſe, vpon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracuſians, that ſallied to impeach their intrenchments. They alſo receiued from their Confederates foure hundred horſe-men, with two hundred other horſe, to mount their men at armes. Syracuſe was now in effect blockt vp, ſo as hardly any ſuccours could enter, but ſuch as were able to force their paſſage: yet the Athenians receiue diuers loſſes; among which it was not the leaſt, that Lamachus, one of their beſt Commanders, was ſlaine.

In the meane while, Gylyppus, and Python, with the Lacedæmonian, and Corinthian forces arriue, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, ioyne with them; ſo that with theſe and his owne troupes, Gylyppus aduentured to march ouer-land towards Syracuſe. The Syracuſians ſend a part of their forces to meet him, and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arriuall neere vnto the Citie, vpon a place of aduantage. At the firſt encounter, they had the better of their enemies, by reaſon that the Syracuſian horſe-men could not come to fight in thoſe ſtreights: but ſoone after, Gylyppus charging them againe, brake them, and conſtrained Nicias to fortifie himſelfe within his Campe. Whereupon Nicias made the ſtate of his affaires knowne, by his letters, to the Athenians; ſhewing, that, without great ſupplies by Sea and Land, the enterpriſe would be loſt, together with the ſmall Armie remaining. Theſe letters receiued, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eurymedon, and Demoſthenes, to ioyne with Nicias: the one they diſpatch preſently with ſome ſupply; the other they ſend after him in the Spring following.

In the meane while, Gylyppus at Syracuſe, fights with the Athenians, both by Sea and Land, Land, sometimes with ill, and at other times with good successe: but in conclusion, he tooke from their Fort, neere vnto Syracuse, at the Promontorie, called Plymmyrium, wherein the Athenians lost their treasure, and a great part of all their prouisions. Notwithstanding which losse, and that the Athenians themselues, in Greece, were (in effect) besieged within Athens, by the Lacedæmonians; yet were they most obstinate in prosecuting the Warre in Sicil, and dispatched away Demosthenes with new succours. Demosthenes, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Polyanthes the Corinthian, with his fleete: both the Captaines being bound for Sicil, the one to succour Nicias, the other Gylyppus. The losse betweene them was in effect equall; and neither so broken, but that each of them prosecuted the enterprise they had in hand. But before the succours arriued to either, Gylyppus and Ariston had assailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuse, and in a Sea-fight put them to the worst, to the great discouragement of the Athenians. On the necke of this, Demosthenes arriued with three-score and thirteene Gallies, charged with footmen; and (blaming the slouth of Nicias) he inuaded the Syracusians, the same day that he arriued. But he made more haste than he had good speede, being shamefully beaten, and repulsed with great losse. Hereupon Demosthenes and Eurymedon, determine to rise vp from before Syracuse, and returne to the succour of Athens: but Nicias disputed to the contrary, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuse, whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

Whatsoeuer Nicias his intelligence was; vpon the arriuall of a new supply into the Towne, the Athenians had all consented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipse of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill successe, caused them to deferre their departure. But this superstition cost them deare. For the Syracusians, Lacedæmonians, and Corinthians, with threescore and seuenteene saile of Gallies, entred the great Port of Syracuse, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and whereon they had fortified themselues. The Athenians, in the same Port encountred them with fourescore and sixe Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon; in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the lesser number, and Eurymedon slaine. Now, though it were so, that the Syracusians receiued the more losse by Land (for the fight was generall) yet when the Athenians were beaten by Sea, in which kinde they thought themselues inuincible, they were wonderfully cast downe. For it was well said of Gylyppus, to the Syracusians; When any people doe finde themselues vanquished in that manner of fight, and with those weapons, in which they perswade themselues that they exceede all others, they not onely lose their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, besides the Gallies suncke and wrackt, had seuenteene taken, and possest by the enemy: and with great labour and losse they defended the rest from being fired, hauing drawne them within a Palisado, in one corner of the Port, vnaduisedly: for it is as contrary to a Sea-warre, to thrust ships into a streight roome and corner, as it is to scatter foot in a plaine field against horse; the one subsisting, by being at large; the other, by close imbattailing.

The Syracusians, hauing now weakned the Athenian fleet, resolue to imprison them within the Port. And to that purpose they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Hauen, being about a mile ouer, and there they came to Anchor; filling the out-let with all manner of Vessels, which they man most strongly, because the Athenians, being now made desperate, should not with double ranks of Gallies breake through the Syracusian fleet; which lay but single, because they were forst to range themselues ouer all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not onely mored themselues strongly by their Anchors, but chained the sides of their Gallies together, and laid behinde them againe certaine ships, which serued in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were sunke; or the chaine, which ioyned them to their fellowes, broken; the Athenians might yet finde themselues, a second time, intangled and arrested. To disorder also those Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to breake through, and force a passage, the Syracusians had left within these Gallies and Ships, inchained together, a certaine number of loose ones, to stop their course and furie. For where the way of any vessell, vsing oare or sailes, is broken, and their speede fore-slowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the resistance opposing.

On the other side, the Athenians knew that they were vtterly lost except with an inuincible resolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats; or (at least) force a passage through them in some part or other: which they re-

ſolue to hazard, with all their ſhipping (to the number of one hundred and ten, of all ſorts) and with all the ſtrength of their Land-armie, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did ſo diſorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as, albeit ſome few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being ſtopt by the ſhips without, & aſſailed by other looſe Gallies of the Syracuſians, which were purpoſely left at large in the Sea, they were either taken or ſunke. Three great diſaduantages the Athenians had: the firſt, that fighting within a Hauen, and (as it were) in a ſteight, they had no roome to turne themſelues, nor to free themſelues one from another, being intangled; the ſecond, that hauing ouer-peſtered their Gallies with Souldiers, who vſed offenſiue armes of darts and ſlings, they had not place vpon the decks to ſtretch their armes: the third was, the diſcomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a paſſage, by which they might ſaue themſelues by running away. To be ſhort, the fight was no leſſe terrible than the confuſion; the ſlaughter great on all ſides; and the noiſe, and the cries, ſo lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as ſaruiued, were beaten backe to the Land, with loſſe of three ſcore of their Gallies, broken, ſunke, or abandoned. The Syracuſians did alſo loſe twenty of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Corinthians. The reſt of the Athenian Gallies, running themſelues into the bottome of the Port, ſaued themſelues by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this deſperate eſtate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counſell. Demoſthenes perſwades them, to furniſh with freſh Souldiers thoſe few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracuſians were triumphing, and made ſecure by their preſent victory, to ſet vpon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counſaile. For, as wee haue heard of many great Captaines (yea, the greateſt number of all that haue beene victorious) that haue neglected the ſpeedy proſecution of a beaten enemy; ſo might we produce many examples of thoſe, who, hauing ſlept ſecurely in the boſome of good ſucceſſe, haue beene ſuddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Armie, and haue thereby loſt againe all the honour, and aduantage, formerly gotten. But Nicias oppoſeth the aduice of Demoſthenes: Others ſay, that the Sea-men were againſt it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all reſolue to march ouer land to the Cities of their Confederates, till ſome more fauourable fortune ſhould call them thence. On the other ſide, Gyphpus, and other the Lacedæmonian and Corinthian Captaines, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracuſians to put themſelues preſently into the field, and to ſtop all the paſſages, leading to thoſe Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retrait. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the preſent. Which humour in ſome of our Commanders at Cadez, loſt vs both the Indian fleet, and the ſpoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracuſian, finding it a loſt labour, to perſwade his Countrimen to any haſtie proſecution, deuiſed this good ſtratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, he ſhould draw them willingly out. He ſent two or three horſe-men out of Syracuſe by night, willing them to finde Nicias, and (after they had aſſured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to giue him aduice not to march away ouer-haſtily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alleadging that the Syracuſians had lodged their Armie, which could not long ſtay there, vpon the paſſages and places of aduantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. Theſe tidings Nicias eaſily beleeued, and put off his iournie to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the moſt part) more fearefull than wiſe; and to them, euery thiſtle in the field, appeares, by night, a man at armes.

The third day (leauing all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remoue; being pierced and purſued with the lamentable out-cries of thoſe that were ſicke and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies ſwords. The reſt march away, to the number of fortie thouſand; and make their firſt paſſage by force, ouer the Riuer of Anapus, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of their enemies. But being euery day charged in their marches, and by the Syracuſian horſe-men, beaten in from forraging and prouiſion of food, they grow weake and heartleſſe. The Syracuſians alſo poſſeſſe the Mountaine Lepas, by which they were to paſſe towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall backe againe towards the Sea-coaſt, and to take what way they could: being vnable to proceede in their iourney intended. Many hard ſhifts they made, in difficult paſſages, and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as hauing none other meanes to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continuall skirmishing. To keepe all in order, Nicias vnder-tooke the leading of the Vantgard; and Demosthenes conducted the Reare. At the Riuer Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march, leauing Demosthenes to make the retrait: who being incompassed, and ouerprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could haue hoped for; and the faith of his enemies farre worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Armie of Demosthenes being dissolued, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage: who being vtterly broken, vpon the passage of the Riuer Assinarus, rendred himselfe to Gylyppus, vpon honest conditions. Gylyppus sought to preserue him, and to haue had the honour, to haue brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble enemie to the Lacedæmonians, and who, at the ouerthrow, which they receiued at Pylus by the Athenians, had saued the liues of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedæmon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusian Armie, disswaded the rest, by all the art he had, from vsing any barbarous violence, after so noble a victory. But the cruell, and the cowardly sort, (cowardise and cruelty, being inseparable passions) preuailed, and caused these braue Captaines to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starued in lothsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaues. This was the successe of the Sicilian warre: which tooke end at the riuer Assinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the fourescore and eleuenth Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicil; the Egestans (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late warre had beene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselues, and their Citie, as their vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicil, yet considering the prosperity of the Syracusians, and their late victories ouer the Athenians, they stayed a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were streightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appeare by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolue vpon the enterprise; and (by a tricke of their Punick wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadours to Syracuse: praying that Citie, as in the behalfe of the Egestans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracusians approued the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they tooke it ill, that the Syracusians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian warre, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a businesse, that themselues could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haue it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace craue aide of Syracuse; and the Syracusians as ill grant it vnto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would haue put into their hands. Hereupon, an Armie of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, vnder the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you haue heard before) was ouerthrowne with the great Carthaginian Armie at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this imploiment, that he might take reuenge, as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them hauing beene slaine by the Himerans, the other by those of Selinus. Both these Cities, Hannibal, in this war, won by force of armes, sackt them, and burnt them; and hauing taken three thousand of the Himerans prisoners, he caused them to be led vnto the place, where Amilcar was slaine, and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates, who had lately beene Generall of the Syracusian forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so farre preuailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meere vertue, at such time, as he was aiding the Lacedæmonians, in their warre against Athens; wherein he did great seruice. All the honester sort within Syracuse were sorry for the iniurie done vnto him, and sought to haue him repealed. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicil, gathered an Armie of sixe thousand; with which he began to repaire Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to win the the loue of his Citizens. But the faction that oppoſed him was the ſtronger. Wherefore, he was aduiſed to ſeize vpon a Gate of Syracuſe, with ſome ſtrength of men; whereby his friends, within the Towne, might haue the better meanes to riſe againſt the aduerſe partie. This he did: but preſently the multitude fell to armes, and ſet vpon him; in which conflict was he ſlaine. But his ſonne-in-law, Dionyſius, ſhall make them wiſh Hermocrates aliue againe.

†. IIII.

Of Dionyſius the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuſe.

THe Syracuſians had enioyed their liberty about threeſcore yeares, from the death of Thraſybulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionyſius was raiſed vp by God, to take reuenge, as well of their cruelty towards ſtrangers, as of their ingratitude towards their owne beſt Citizens. For before the time of Dionyſius, they had made it their paſtime, to reward the vertue of their worthieſt Commanders with death, or diſgrace: which cuſtome they muſt now be taught to amend.

Dionyſius obtained the principalitie of Syracuſe, by the ſame degrees, that many others, before him, had made themſelues Maſters of other Cities, and of Syracuſe it ſelfe. For, being made Prator, and commanding their Armies againſt the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaued himſelfe ſo well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warre. Then began he to follow the example of Piſiſtratus, that made himſelfe Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of ſixe hundred men, to defend his perſon: vnder pretence, that his priuate enemies, being traiterouſly affected to the State of Syracuſe, had laied plots how to murder him, becauſe of his good ſeruices. He doubled the pay of the Souldiers; alledging, that it would encourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to aſſure them to himſelfe. He perſwaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, thoſe that had beene baniſhed, which were the beſt men of Syracuſe; and theſe were afterwards at his deuotion, as obliged vnto him by ſo great a benefit. His firſt fauour, among the Syracuſians, grew from his accuſation of the principall men. It is the delight of baſe people to reigne ouer their betters: wherefore, gladly did he helpe them to breake downe, as fetters impriſoning their liberty, the barres that held it vnder ſafe cuſtody. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found whereat he aimed. But what they ſaw, the people would not ſee: and ſome that were needy, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purpoſes to be ſuch, as would make all the Citie to ſmart. He began early to hunt after the tyranny; being but fiue and twenty yeeres of age when he obtained it: belike, it was his deſire to reigne long. His firſt worke, of making himſelfe abſolute Lord in Syracuſe, was, the poſſeſſion of the Citadell; wherein was much good prouiſion, and vnder it the Gallies were moored. This he obtained by allowance of the people; and hauing obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himſelfe without all ſhame or feare. The Armie, the chiefe Citizens, reſtored by him from baniſhment; all the needy ſort within Syracuſe, that could not thriue by honeſt courſes; and ſome neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for eſtabliſhing the faction, reigning at that preſent, were wholly affected to his aſſiſtance. Hauing therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, ſaue to aſſure what he had already. He ſtrengthned himſelfe by diuers marriages; taking firſt to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionyſius, his Succeſſor; the other, Ariſtomache, the daughter of Hipparinus, and ſiſter to Dion, honourable men in Syracuſe; which bare vnto him many children, that ſerued to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere ſome of the Syracuſians (enuying his proſperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes againſt him, euen in the noueltie of his Rule. But their enterpriſe was more paſſionately, than wiſely gouerned. He had ſhamefully beene beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them ſuſpect that it was his purpoſe to let the Carthaginians waſte all, that he might afterwards take poſſeſſion of the deſolate places; ſo it inflamed them with a deſire to free themſelues from his tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched haſtily to Syracuſe, where they found friends to helpe them: there they forced his Palace, ranſaked ſacked his treaſures, and ſo ſhamefully abuſed his wife, that for the griefe thereof ſhe poiſoned her ſelfe. But he followed their heeles apace; and firing a Gate of the Citie by night, entred ſoone enough to take reuenge, by making a ſpeedy riddance of them. For he ſpared none of his knowne, no, not his ſuſpected enemies. After that, he grew ſo doubtfull of his life, as he neuer durſt truſt Barber to trim him, nor any perſon, no, not ſo much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, vnſtript and ſearched. He was the greateſt Robber of the people that euer reigned in any State; and withall the moſt vnreſpectiuely cruell.

After this, he ſeparated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Iland, from the reſt; like as the Spaniard did the Citadell of Antwerpe: therein he lodged his treaſures, and his Guards.

He then began to make warre vpon the free Cities of Sicil: but while he lay before Herbeſſe, an in-land Towne, the Syracuſians rebelled againſt him; ſo, as with great difficultie he recouered his Citadell: from whence, hauing allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their paſſage through the Citie, with one thouſand and two hundred horſe, he againe recouered the maſterie ouer the Syracuſians. And when a multitude of them were buſied in gathering in their Haruеſt, he diſarmed all the Townes-men remayning: and new ſtrengthned the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. He incloſed that part alſo, called Epipoles; which, with threeſcore thouſand labourers, he finiſhed in three weekes, being two leagues in compaſſe. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortie thouſand Targets, with as many ſwords, and head-peeces, with foureteene thouſand corſlets, and all other ſutable armes. Which done, he ſent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly enfeebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greeke Townes, which they held in Sicil, he would make warre vpon them: and, not ſtaying for anſwere, he tooke the ſpoile of all the Phœnician ſhips, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the ſecond did of our Engliſh, before the warre in our late Queenes time. He then goes to the field with foureſcore thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, and ſends his brother Leptines to ſea, with two hundred Gallies, and fiue hundred ſhips of burden. Moſt of the Townes which held for Carthage yeelded vnto him; ſauing Panormus, Segeſta or Egeſta, Ancyræ, Motya, and Entella. Of theſe, he firſt wan Motya by aſſault, and put all therein to the ſword; but before Egeſta he loſt a great part of his Armie, by a ſally of the Citizens. In the meane while Himilco arriues; but, ere he tooke land, he loſt in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fiftie ſhips of warre, and fiue thouſand Souldiers, beſides many ſhips of burden. This notwithſtanding, he recouered againe Motya vpon his firſt deſcent. From thence marching towards Meſſena, he tooke Lypara, and (ſoone after) Meſſena, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionyſius greatly to doubt his eſtate. He therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territorie of the Leontines, by which he ſuppoſed that Himilco would paſſe toward Syracuſe; and he himſelfe tooke the field againe, with foure and thirtie thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe. Now, hearing that Himilco had diuided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halfe ouer-land, and ſending Mago with the other by Sea: he ſent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Mago. But Leptines was vtterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twentie thouſand of his men were ſlaine, and an hundred of his Gallies loſt. It is very ſtrange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authours tell vs; That one Citie ſhould be able to furniſh fiue hundred ſaile of ſhips, and two hundred Gallies: (for, ſo many did Syracuſe arme in this warre) and more ſtrange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-ſhot, twenty thouſand ſhould be ſlaine in one fight. In all our fights againſt the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the moſt notable, wee heare of no ſuch number loſt; nor in any other fight by Sea, that euer hapned in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the fift went to beſiege Algier, he had in all his fleet, tranſporters and others, but two hundred and fiftie ſaile of ſhippes, and threeſcore and fiue Gallies: for the furniſhing of which fleet, he ſought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the reſt of Italie. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the field, vpon extremitie, as many as were needefull, of all that could beare armes, gluing them little wages, or other allowance: in our dayes it is not ſo; neither indeede, is it often requiſite. Vpon this ouerthrow, Dionyſius poſtes away to Syracuſe, to ſtrengthen it: Himilco followes him, and beſiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the hauing receiued aide from the Lacedæmonians, vnder the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himſelfe to Sea, to make prouiſion for his Citizens, who in his abſence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and ſinke foure. Hereupon, finding their owne ſucceſſe proſperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill: hauing alſo at the preſent weapons in their hands; they conſult how to recouer their liberty. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian reſiſted them. It alſo fell out, to his exceeding aduantage, that the plague was ſo increaſed, and ſo violent, among the Carthaginians; as it is ſaid, that aboue an hundred thouſand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the power that he could gather together, ſets vpon them both by Sea and Land; and hauing ſlaine great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to deſire peace. This peace Dionyſius ſold him for a great ſumme of monie; on condition that he ſhould ſteale away with his Carthaginians onely: which he baſely accepted, betraying the reſt of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was purſued, and left many of his Carthaginians behinde him. The reſt of the Africans fell vnder the ſwords of their enemies; onely the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended themſelues, were (after their ſubmiſſion) entertained, and ſerued the Conquerour.

Many ſuch examples of perfidious dealing haue I noted in other places, and can hardly forbeare to deliuer vnto memory the like practiſes, when they meete with their matches: That which hapned vnto Monſieur de Piles, was very ſutable to this trecherie; wherewith Dionyſius purſued Himilmo. I was preſent, when De Piles related the iniurie done vnto him. He had rendered S. Iohn d' Angelie, to the French King Charles the ninth, who beſieged him therein. He rendred it, vpon promiſe made by the faith of a King, that hee ſhould be ſuffered to depart in ſafety, with all his followers. Yet in preſence of the King himſelfe, of the Duke of Anion his brother, Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of diuers Dukes and Marſhals of France, he was ſet vpon, and broken in his March; ſpoiled of all that he had; and forced to ſaue his life by flight, leauing the moſt of his Souldiers dead vpon the place: the Kings hand and faith, warranting him to march away with enſignes diſplaid, and with all his goods and prouiſions, no whit auailing him. It needes not therefore ſeeme ſtrange, that an Heathen Tyrant ſhould thus breake his faith, ſince Kings, profeſſing Chriſtianitie, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Dionyſius, after this great victory, tooke care to re-edifie Meſſena. Mago, who ſtaied in Sicil, to hold vp the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Dionyſius; who is alſo beaten by the Tauromenians. A new ſupply of foureſcore thouſand Souldiers is ſent from Carthage to Mago; but theſe take egges for their money, and make peace with Dionyſius, leauing the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to ſhift for themſelues: whom Dionyſius, after a long ſiege, ouer-came, and gaue their Citie to his mercinarie Souldiers.

He then paſt into Italie, obtained diuers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred & foureſcore thouſand crownes, to furniſh him with threeſcore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for aſſurance of their future obſeruance of couenants. This he did, not with any purpoſe to performe vnto them the peace that they had ſo dearely bought; but that hauing taken from them their Gallies, he might beſiege them, and ruine them vtterly, with the more eaſe. Now to the end hee might not, without ſome colour, falſifie the faith that he had giuen to them; he pretended to want victuall for his Armie, at ſuch time as he ſeemed ready to depart out of Italie, and ſent to them to furniſh him therewith; promiſing to returne them the like qualitie, at his comming home to Syracuſe.

His reſolution was, that if they refuſed to furniſh him, he would then make their refuſall the cauſe of his quarrell: if they yeelded to aide him with the proportion which he deſired, that then they ſhould not be able, for want of food, to endure a ſiege any long time againſt him. For to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price ſoeuer. And great reaſon he had to take reuenge of them, if hee had done it fairely, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his reigne, he deſired them to beſtow a daughter of ſome of their Nobilitie vpon him for a wife: they anſwered, That they had not any one fit for him, ſaue the Hang-mans daughter. Princes doe rather pardon ill deedes, than villanous words. Alexander the Great forgaue many ſharpe ſwords, but neuer any ſharpe tongues; no, though they told him but truely of his errours.

And certainly, it belongs to those that haue warrant from God, to reprehend Princes: and to none else, especially in publique.

It is said, that Henrie the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his ouer-bold and biting taunts, that he vsed against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracie with the Spaniard, or Sauoyan: for he had pardoned ten thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawne their swords against him. The contemptuous words that Sir Iohn Parret vsed of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfait letter of the Romish Priest, produced against him. So fared it with some other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, soone after.

To be short, he made them know new bread from old. Hee assaulted their Towne on all sides, which hee continued to doe eleuen moneths, till he wonne it by force. He vsed his victory without mercy, specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other warres he made with the Carthagimians, after the taking and rasing of this Citie; and those with variable successe. For as in one encounter he slue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: so the sonne of Mago beat him, and slue his brother Leptines, with foureteene thousand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his peace of the Carthagimians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the aduice of Prosperity and Aduersitie, as all Kings and States doe.

When he had reigned eight and thirty yeeres, he died: some say in his bed, peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man he was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a fooliish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyranny, he gaue order to haue him slaine, or sold for a slaue. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore stiled his cruelty, The hate of euill men; and his lawlesse slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his iustice. True it is, that flatterers are a kinde of vermine, which poison all the Princes of the Word; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valianteſt men doe: and I wonder not at it, for it is a world: and as our Saniour Christ hath told vs, The world will loue her owne.

To this Dionysius his sonne of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his Kingdome and his Vices. To win the loue of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt vp, and condemned. Withall, he remitted vnto his Citizens diuers payments, by his Father imposed vpon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that he had fastned vnto himselfe the peoples affections; he cast off the Sheepes skin, and put on that of the Woolfe. For being iealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, he caused them all to be slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dionysius his Father (as hath been said) had two Wiues; Doris of Locris, and Aristomache a Syracusian, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Aristomache he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrosyne, he gaue in marriage to his eldest Sonne, and her halfe-brother, Dionysius; the yonger, called Areta, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death, Dion tooke her to Wife, being his Neece.

This Dion, a iust, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that he was wholly giuen ouer to sensualitie, preuailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sicil, to instruct the yong King. And hauing perswaded the King to entertaine him, he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius began to change condition; to change Tyrannie, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principalitie, that he had, rather by the loue of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrisons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Parasites, that hated Dions seueritie, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour, and caused him soone after to be banished out of Sicil, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels betweene him and the Carthagimians, of whom Dionysius stood in great feare; or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gallies at his owne charge, during the warre against them: his enemies found meanes, by ſiniſter interpretation, to conuert his good will into matter of treaſon. They told Dionyſius, that all the great commendations, giuen of Plato, had tended to none other end, then to ſoften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the ſtudy of Philoſophie; whileſt Dion, in the meane time hauing furniſhed fiftie Gallies, vnder colour of the Kings ſeruice, had it in his owne power, either to deliuer to the Syracuſians their former liberty, or to make himſelfe Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honeſt and liberall offer which he made, to ſerue the King with ſo great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had ſerued the King for none other end, than to raiſe and enrich themſelues, and had already beene raiſed and enriched, thought themſelues bound to make the ſame offer, that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceiue it aright. But theſe couetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dion had, were bold to ſtile his Loue and Liberalitie, Pride and Preſumption; and heartned the yong King, in his oppreſſing, and eating vp his owne people, of whoſe ſpoyles they themſelues ſhared no ſmall portion. I haue heard it, That when Charles the fift had the repulſe at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando Corteſe, one of the braueſt men that euer Spaine brought forth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the ſiege at his owne charge. But he had neuer good day after it. For they that enuied his victories, and his conqueſt of Mexico in the weſt Indies, perſwaded the Emperour, that Corteſe ſought to value himſelfe aboue him; and to haue it ſaid, That what the Emperour could not, Corteſe had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly baniſhed, the Tyrant was contented, at firſt, to ſend him the reuenewes of his Lands, and permit him to diſpoſe of his moueables, at his owne pleaſure: nor without giuing hope, to recall him in ſhort time. Had he continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would haue beene well pleaſed to liue well, as he did at Athens. But after ſome time, Dionyſius made Port-ſale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby vrged him to take another courſe, euen to ſeeke the reſtitution of his Countrie to libertie. The vertues of Dion, eſpecially his great liberalitie, had purchaſed much loue in Greece. This loue made him ſuſpected and hated of the Tyrant: but it ſtood him in good ſtead, when he ſought to raiſe men, with whoſe helpe he might returne into Sicil. Yet he got not aboue eight hundred (for he carried the matter cloſely) to follow him in this aduenture. But many of them were men of qualitie, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuſe, as many as ſhould be needefull, that would readily aſſiſt him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil, marched to Syracuſe, entred the Citie without reſiſtance, armed the multitude, and won all, ſaue the Citadell.

Dionyſius was then abſent in Italie, but hee quickely had aduertiſement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore hee returned haſtily to Syracuſe: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and ſome forceable attempts to recouer the Towne, hee was faine to depart, leauing yet the Caſtle to the cuſtody of Apollocrates his eldeſt ſon. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philiſtus, comming with a ſtrengtn of men to aſſiſt him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recouery of his Countries libertie, had the ſame reward, that all worthy men haue had from popular Eſtates. Hee was diſgraced, aſſaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retired himſelfe to the Leontines, who receiue him with great ioy. Soone after his departure from Syracuſe, new troupes enter the Caſtle: they ſallie out, aſſaile, ſpoyle, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is ſent for, with humble requeſt: yet, ere hee could arriue, Dionyſius his Souldiers were retired; and the Townesmen, thinking themſelues ſecure, ſhut the gates againſt Dion. But the next night they of the Caſtle ſallie againe, with greater furie then euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Childe, and ſet fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the ſecond time to their ſuccour; the loue of his Countrey ſurmounting all the iniuries that he had receiued. Hee ſets vpon the Garriſon of the Caſtle, with the one part of his Armie; and quencheth the fire euery-where kindled, with the other part. In concluſion, after he had conquered both the fire and the ſword, that had well-neere burnt to aſhes, and depopulated Syracuſe, he recouered the Caſtle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and ſent Apollocrates, after Dionysius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom he had best deserued, and whom he had loued most, gaue an vntimely end to his dayes. For he was soone after this his victory, murdered by Gylyppus; who, after he had, with ill successe, a while gouerned Syracuse, was slaine with the same Dagger, with which hee had murdered Dion.

Ten yeares after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italie, recouers his estate, and returnes to Syracuse, driuing Nysaus thence, whom he found Gouernour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing, more then euer, his cruelty, flee to Icetes, a Syracusian borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not onely to preuaile against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their Citie. The Syracusians, being deseruedly afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Icetes also sends thither, and disswades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermedling in the businesse. He tels them, by his messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land any Armie in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Icetes, more inraged then disswaded, sent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliuer Syracuse from tyrannie. In the meane while, Icetes had entred Syracuse, and with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driuen Dionysius into the Castle, where he besieged him.

Icetes, being himselfe a Tyrant in Leontium, rather sought how to enlarge his power, than, how to deliuer his Countrie. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arriued at Rhegium, he sent to perswade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) established in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were also in the same Port of Rhegium; whose Captaines aduised Timolion, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, then he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perswaded. Timoleon, finding himselfe ouer-mastered, makes request to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleased to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open assembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him those arguments, for his returne, which they had vsed to him in priuate; that he might, by publique testimonie, discharge himselfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perswading themselues, that a victory, obtained by a few faire words, was without losse, and farre more easie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleons desire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegians, stole out of the preasse; and hauing set saile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recouered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was ioyfully receiued by Andromachus the Gouernour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, were surprising Icetes his Armie, he slue a part thereof, and put the rest to run. It is the nature of victory to beget friends. The Adranitans ioyned with him; and so did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionysius also sent to Timoleon, offering to surrender the Castle of Syracuse into his hands, as thinking it better to yeelde vp himselfe, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he disdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fiftie daies, after his arriuall, had recouered the Castle of Syracuse, and sent Dionysius to Corinth, to liue there a priuate man, was still inuaded by the Armies, and molested by the practices of Icetes. For he besieged the Corinthians within the Castle of Syracuse, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians send vnto Timoleon a supply of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which are staid in Italie by foule weather. Icetes is strengthned with threescore thousand Africans, brought vnto him by Hasdrubal (all which he lodgeth within Syracuse) and with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the first time, that euer the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armie, Icetes assaulteth the Castle. Timoleon sends them victuels, and succour; in small boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Icetes doe therefore resolue to besiege Catana; but they were no sooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captaine of the Corinthians, sallied out of the Castle, and tooke that part of Syracuse, called Acradina, which lie fortified.

In the meane while, the two thousand Corinthians arriue with whom, and two thousand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuse. Mago abandoneth Acradina, being being frighted out of Sicil (which he might easily haue conquered) with an idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for feare of farther punishment, he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Castle (which he called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; so as their horses did feede on the grasse, growing in the market-place. Therefore, he writes to Corinth, for people to re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italie; others, from other parts of the Iland.

But a new storme ariseth. Asdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arriue about Lilybæum, with threescore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their prouisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Armie vpon the passage of a Riuer.

A tempest of raine, haile, and lightning, with boysterous windes, beating vpon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are vtterly broken: ten thousand slaine, fiue thousand taken; with all their carriages and prouisions: among which there were found a thousand corslets, gilt, and grauen. After this Timoleon, gaue an ouerthrow to Icetes, and following his victory, tooke him, with his son Eupolemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slaine: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he suffered Icetes his wiues and daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of God vpon Icetes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dions wife and a yong child of his, with Aristomache his sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He againe preuailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana it selfe. Mamercus fled to Hippon Tyrant of Messena: but Timoleon, pursuing him, won the towne; deliuering Hippon to his Citizens, who tormented him to death, The same end had Mamercus, and all other, the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition, That they should not passe the Riuer of Lycus. After this, he liued in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death; and was solemnely buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funerals, being for euer ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time, as Timoleon had deliuered Syracuse, from the tyrannie of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Iland; the inhabitants enioyed their libertie in peace, about twentie yeeres. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safetie; and the Labouring man enioyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time subsist.

Twentie yeares after the death of Timoleon, there started vp one Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degree to degree, rising to be a Prator; finally, became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he ran, and vnder-went as many dangers, ere he obtained the Principalitie. For hee had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable seruice, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable seruice: and on the contrary, as memorable seruice for the Murgantines, against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, he sackt Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so streightly, that the Citizens were driuen to craue aide, euen from their ancient and naturall enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians, to relieue Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace betweene himselfe and the Syracusians; binding himselfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and seruant to the State of Carthage, for euer after. Amilcar entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrels betweene Agathocles, and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prator; he entertaines fiue thousand Africans, and diuers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, vnder colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie also being diuided into many factions) hee assailes the Senators, kils all his enemies and opposites;

diuides the ſpoile of the rich, among the poore; and giues liberty to his Souldiers, to rob, to rauiſh, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controlement: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and ſtrewed the ſtreets with ten thouſand dead carkaſſes, beſides thoſe that had broken their necks ouer the wals; their furie had no further ſubiect to worke on.

Agathocles, in an aſſembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perſwaded them, that, for the violent ſickneſſe, by which the common-wealth was vtterly conſumed, he found no better, than the violent remedies, which he had adminiſtred; and that he affected no other thing, than the reducing of the ſtate from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magiſtrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democratie, by which it had beene gouerned, from the firſt inſtitution, with ſo great glory and proſperitie. This he did, to haue the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For as he knew, that he had left none liuing, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exerciſe the office of a Magiſtrate: ſo knew he right well, that all they which had aſſiſted, in the murder and ſpoile of their fellow Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the ſupport of a lawleſſe Lord, who had beene partaker with them, in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe, ſaluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had beene giuen to him by ſome lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a peece of his patterne; but the one was of baſe, the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke liberty from a Common-weale; the other ſought onely to ſucceede in a Monarchie; the one continued his cruelty to the end; the other, after hee had obtained the Crowne, ſought, by making good lawes, to recouer the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Iuſtine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the ſumme whereof is this. The ſame Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuſe, and that had lent him fiue thouſand men to helpe in the maſſacre of the Cirizens, was alſo content to winke at many wrongs, that he did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpoſe of Amilcar, to ſettle Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vexe and waſte the whole Iland; becauſe it was thereby like to come to paſſe, that he ſhould reduce all Sicil into ſuch termes as would make it become an eaſie prey to Carthage. But when the Cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, ſent their Embaſſadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (ſo much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meere falſhood) ſhewed it ſelfe very honourable, in taking order for the redreſſe. Embaſſadours were ſent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in minde of his couenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africk, and a new Captain appointed to ſucceede in his charge, with ſuch forces, as might compell Agathocles to reaſon, if otherwiſe he would not harken to it. All this tended, to ſaue their Confederates, from ſuffering ſuch iniuries in the future. For that which was paſt (ſince it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it ſeuerely puniſhed. Amilcar was accuſed ſecretly, and by way of ſcrutinie: the ſuffrages being giuen, but not calculated; and ſo reſerued, vntill he ſhould returne. This was not ſo cloſely handled, but that Amilcar had ſoone notice of it. In managing his buſineſſe with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrie. For he had made ſuch a compoſition with the Syracuſian, as gaue him not onely meanes to weaken others, but to ſtrengthen himſelfe, both in power and authoritie, euen againſt the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the cuſtome of thoſe, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practices, thinking to deale ſubtilly, and finely, they ſpin their threads ſo ſmall, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilcar ſaw, that his Carthaginians had a purpoſe to deale ſubſtantially; and that therefore it would be hard for him, to make them follow his crooked deuices: which if he could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into ſo much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which ſome of his fore-goers had taught him; and, for feare of ſuch a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what ſort he thought beſt. This deſperation of Amilcar ſerued to informe Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. Hee ſaw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore reſolued to get the ſtart of them in action. Hee diſſembled no longer; but, in ſtead of ſpoile and robbery, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicil his owne, ere the Carthaginian forces arriued: which thinking to haue encountred an ill-eſtabliſhed Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and giue them ſharpe entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Nauie was ſo Tempeſt-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leaue their buſineſſe vndone, and returne into Africke.

Carthaginians

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furniſhed, was broken by foule weather, and the beſt part of it caſt away, euen whileſt it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilcar, the ſonne of Giſco, gathering together the remainders of this ſhip-wracke, was bold to paſſe ouer into Sicil, and landed not farre from Gela; where Agathocles was ſoone readie to examine the cauſe of their comming. Many skirmiſhes paſſed betweene them, in which (commonly) the Syracuſian had the better. But his good ſucceſſe begat preſumption; whereby hee loſt a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduerſe chance is enough to ouerthrow the ſtate of a Tyrant, if it be not vp held by great circumſpection. The war was ſoone transferred to the walls of Syracuſe; within which Agathocles was cloſed vp, and driuen to make his laſt defence by their helpe, who may be iudged to haue loued him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuſe, after that great maſſacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new Tyrannie, were (for the moſt part) ſuch, as had beene either mercinarie Souldiers, infranchiſed ſlaues, or baſe & needie people; helpers in eſtabliſhing the preſent Gouernment, and Executioners of the murders, and ſpoyle, committed in that change. If there were any other (as ſome there were) they were ſo well obſerued, and (withall) ſo fearefull, that they durſt not ſtirre. But it was enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themſelues and their Citie; Famine was likely to grow vpon them, and enforce them to change their reſolution. In this neceſſity, Agathocles aduentured vpon a ſtrange courſe, which the euent commended as wiſe. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in thoſe veſſells that rode in the Hauen; and committing the gouernment of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had bethought himſelfe of a meane, both to raiſe the ſiege, and to repaire all other loſſes. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the beſieged from iſſuing forth.

Now, at ſuch time as Agathocles was ready to depart, aduertiſement came, that many ſhips of burden, laden with corne, and other prouiſions, were drawing neere vnto Syracuſe. To intercept theſe, the Carthaginians hoiſe ſaile, and lanch forth into the deepe. They were not farre gone, when they might behold Agathocles, iſſuing forth of the Port, with purpoſe (as they thought) to giue conuoy vnto his victuallers. Heereupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their comming, nor fled backe into the Citie, but made all ſpeed towards Africke; and was purſued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would giue them light. In the meane ſeaſon, the victuallers were gotten to Syracuſe; which was the more plentifully relieued by their comming, for that Agathocles had vnburdened the place of no ſmall number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceiued; firſt, that by purſuing two fleets at once, he had miſſed of them both; and ſecondly, that Agathocles returned not againe, but was gone to ſeeke his fortune elſewhere, hee thought it good to purſue thoſe that were fled, and to attend ſo well vpon them, that they ſhould not haue leiſure to doe miſchiefe in ſome other part.

The Carthaginian Nauie followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of ſuch as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after ſixe dayes. He had (at the firſt) a great ſtart of them; ſo that (belike) they rowed hard; and wearied themſelues, in ſeeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, & beat them; and, hauing ſunke, or taken many, draue the reſt to flie which way they could, laden with ſuch ſtrange tidings of his voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did hee diſcouer vnto them his proiect; letting them vnderſtand, That there was no better way to diuert the Carthaginians, not onely from Syracuſe, but frō all the Ile of Sicil, than by bringing the war to their own doores. For here (ſaid he) they haue many that hate them, and that will readily take armes againſt them, as ſoone as they perceiue that there is an Armie on foote, which dares to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified; their people vntrained, and and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercenarie forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if we offer greater wages than they can giue: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them haue some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue words encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reseruing one or two to vse as Messengers,) to the end that no hope should remaine, saue onely in victory. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities; which after they had throughly sacked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Armie destroied in Sicil. This impression so dismaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage vnto the enemie; they raise a great Armie, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno, and Bomilcar; great enemies, and therefore the more vnlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generalls of the Armie leuied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldome happens, that dissension betweene Commanders produceth any fortunate euent. Necessity draue Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolued to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not starre: but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian society, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victorie winneth many Townes, and sends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicil, willing Amilcar, their Generall, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to bee lost, whilest hee was trauailing in the conquest of Sicil. Amilcar sends them fiue thousand men: all his forces hee thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles backe into Sicil, than to bee drawne home by one, that could scarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a badde issue. Hee spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adhered vnto the Syracusians: and hauing brought his matters to some good order, hee conceiued a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surprise. It was a prettie (though tragicall) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dreame, which told him that he should suppe the next day within Syracuse. His fancie begot this dreame, and he verily beleeued it. He made more haste than good speed, toward the Citie: and comming vpon it on the sudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrappe him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that hee had no great cheare to his supper: for they strucke off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. Hee had allured Ophellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliuer the Countrie into his hands: for that (as he said) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to haue diuerted the Carthaginians from Sycil, wherein (after this warre ended) he might reigne quietly. Ophellas came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traiterous Sicilian, taking an aduantage, did murther this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his Warres. Thus his villanie found good successe; and he so preuailed in Africke, that hee got leysure to make a step into Sicil. Many Townes in Sicil had embraced a desire of recouering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had so long beene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countrie. These had preuailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the comming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of

Sicil hee returned into Africk, where his affaires ſtood in very bad termes. Archagathus, his ſonne, had loſt a battaile; and (which was worſe) had ill meanes to helpe himſelfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lacke of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accuſtomed promiſes of great bootie and ſpoyle. It had now beene time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtaine, they would (queſtionleſſe) haue giuen to him, both mony enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their Citie had beene diſtreſſed, not onely by this his warre, but by the treaſon of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himſelfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conqueſt of Carthage it ſelfe: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the loſſe of a battaile, not ſo memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the ſtrange euents following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old ſacrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abſtained, euer ſince they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of ſome, the goodlieſt of their priſoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the ſaid Idoll, in way of thankefulneſſe for their victorie. The fire, with which theſe vnhappie men were conſumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings neereſt vnto the Altar; and ſpreading it ſelfe farther through the Campe, with the deſtruction of many men, cauſed ſuch a tumult as is vſuall in the like caſes. At the ſame time, the like accident of fire burnt vp the Pauilion of Agathocles. Heereupon both the Armies fledde away; each of them beleeuing, that the noiſe in the aduerſe Campe, was a ſigne of the enemies comming to inuade it. But the Carthaginians had a ſafe retrait: Agathocles, by a ſecond errour, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to be enemies, (as indeede the one halfe of them had reuolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the laſt battaile) hee beganne to aſſaile them, and was ſo ſtoutly reſiſted, that hee loſt in this blinde fight, aboue foure thouſand of his men. This did ſo diſcourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neere hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto ſome diſtruſt of his owne ſafetie, he knew no more how to moderate his preſent weake feares, than lately he had known how to gouerne his ambition. Therefore hee tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to ſteale cloſely a-boord his ſhippes, with his yonger ſonne (the elder he ſuſpected of Inceſt, and of Ambition) and ſo to flie into Sicil; thinking it the beſt courſe to ſhift for himſelfe, as wanting veſſels wherein to tranſport his Armie. His elder ſon, Archagathus, perceiued his drift, arreſted him, and put him vnder cuſtodie: but by meanes of a ſudden tumult, he was let looſe, eſcaped, and fled alone, leauing both his ſonnes behinde him. His flight being noyſed through the Armie, all was in vproare; and extremitie of rage cauſed not onely the common Souldier, but euen ſuch as had beene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two ſonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extreamely baſe; I need not vſe words to proue: That his feare was truly, as all feare is ſaid to be, a paſſion, depriuing him of the ſuccours which reaſon offered, the ſequele doth manifeſt. His forſaken Souldiers, being now a headleſſe company, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuertheleſſe a reaſonable compoſition from the Carthaginians: to whom they ſold thoſe places, whereof they had poſſeſſion, for ninteene talents. Likewiſe, Agathocles himſelfe, hauing loſt his Armie, did neuertheleſſe, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace with Carthage vpon equall termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraine enemies, diſcouered his bloudie nature, in moſt abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feares, vrged him ſo violently, that he was not ſatisfied with the ſpoyles of the rich, or the death of thoſe whom he held ſuſpected: but in a beaſtly rage depopulated whole Cities. He deuiſed new engines of torment; wherein ſtriuing to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, hee made a frame of braſſe, that ſhould ſerue to ſcorch mens bodies; and withall giue him leaue to behold them in their miſerie. So deuiliſh is the nature of man, when reaſon, that ſhould be his guide, is become a ſlaue to his brutiſh affections. In theſe miſchiefes he was ſo outragious, that he neither ſpared Sexe, nor Age; eſpecially, when hee was informed of the ſlaughter of his children in Affrick. But this was not the way to preſerue his eſtate: for threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chaſed out of their Country, tooke armes againſt him; and draue him into ſuch feare, that hee was faine to ſeeke the loue at Carthage, which by ruling well hee might haue had in Sicil. Hee freely de-

liuered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phœnicians in Sicil, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They requited him honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and siluer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he preuailed against the Rebells, and setled his estate. Hauing no further businesse left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italie. There hee subdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they yeelded at his first comming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when hee had gotten this great summe, hee would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoyle the Temples of their gods. Heerein (me-thinkes) hee did well enough. For how could hee beleeue those to be gods, that had continually giuen deafe eares to his horrible periuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grieuous sickenesse fell vpon him, that rotted his whole body, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Theogenia (a wife that he had taken out of Ægypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a yonger sonne of his owne, began to contend about the Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the olde Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well that he slue his Vncle, and got his Grandfathers Kingdome, without asking any leaue. These tidings wounded the heart of Agathocles with feare and sorrow. Hee saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his vngracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no fauour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom onely hee now held deare, which were Theogenia and her children. Therefore he aduised her and them to flie before they were surprised: for that otherwise they could by no meanes auoide, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he euen compelled them (weeping to leaue him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselues hastily, and made speed into Ægypt. After their departure, whether hee threw himselfe into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as hee first beganne it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traiterously occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the Iland. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that he quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driuen to send for Pyrrhus to help them, who had married with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soone wearie of the Countrie (as hath beene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophecying that it would become a goodly champion field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superioritie. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our Storie will declare.

§. V.

A recontinuation of the Roman warre in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsooke the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

WHen Appius Claudius, following the aduantage of his victorie gotten at Messana, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great Citie; Hieron found it high time for him to seeke peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to bee offended with him, for helping himselfe by what meanes hee could, when they were not in case to giue him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without feare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were fighting for the masterie. In this good mood, the new Roman Consuls, M. Valerius, and C. Otacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made

ſe of their preſent aduantage, and ſold him peace for an hundred (ſome ſay two hundred) Talents.

Theſe Conſuls had brought a great Armie into Sicil; yet did they nothing elſe in effect, than bring ouer Hiero to their ſide. If the Syracuſians held them buſied (which I find not, otherwiſe than by circumſtances, as, by the ſumme of monie impoſed vpon him, and by their performing none other peece of ſeruice) all the whole time of their abode in the Iland; then was his departure from the friendſhip of Carthage, no leſſe to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reaſon could they require, that he ſhould ſuffer his owne Kingdom to runne into manifeſt perill of ſubuerſion, for their ſakes, that ſhould haue receiued all the profit of the victorie: ſeeing they did expoſe him to the whole danger, without ſtraying themſelues to giue him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the ſtrength of Syracuſe, in the daies of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare a very ſtrong ſiege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more ſlacke, in ſending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not ſome part of their deſire, that both Rome and Syracuſe ſhould weaken one the other; whereby their owne worke might be the eaſier againſt them both. Yet indeed, the caſe of the beſieged Citie was not the ſame, when the Romans lay before it, as it had beene, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reaſon, to try the vttermoſt hazard of war againſt the Carthaginians, who ſought no other thing than to bring it into ſlauerie: not ſo againſt the Romans, who thought it ſufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Beſides, it was not all one to be gouerned by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of theſe cared not what the citizens endured, ſo long as he might preſerue his owne tyrannie: the later, as a iuſt and good Prince, had no greater deſire then to winne the loue of his people, by ſeeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honeſt and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to paſſe, that he enioyed a long and happy reigne, liuing deare to his own Subiects, beloued of the Romans, and not greatly moleſted by the Carthaginians; whom, either the conſideration, That they had left him to himſelfe, ere he left their ſocietie, made vnwilling to ſeeke his ruine; or their more earneſt buſineſſe with the Romans, made vnable to compaſſe it.

§. VI.

How the Romans beſiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their firſt loſſe, and firſt victorie by Sea. Of Seafight in generall.

Hieron, hauing ſided himſelfe with the Romans, aided them with victualls, and other neceſſaries: ſo that they, preſuming vpon his aſſiſtance, recall ſome part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to beſtirre them; they ſend to the Ligurians, and to the troopes they had in Spaine, to come to their aide; who being arriued, they made the Citie of Agrigentum, the ſeat of the war, againſt the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Conſulls, hauing made peace with Hieron, returne into Italie; and, in their places, Lucius Poſthumus, and Quintus Mamilius, arriue. They goe on towards Agrigentum: and finding no enemie in the field, they beſiege it, though it were ſtuffed with fiftie thouſand Souldiers. After a while, the time of harueſt being come, a part of the Romane Armie range the Countrey to gather corne, and thoſe at the ſiege grow negligent; the Carthaginians ſallie furiouſly, and indanger the Roman Armie, but are in the end repelled into the towne with great loſſe; but by the ſmart felt on both ſides, the Aſſailants redoubled their guards, and the beſieged kept within their couert. Yet the

* Agrigentum was a goodly City, built by the Geloi, vnder conduct of Ariſton and Pyſtilus. The compaſſe was tenne miles about the walls; and it had ſometimes in it eight hundred thouſand Inhabitants. This City, by reaſon of the fertilitie of the ſoile, and the neighbour-hood of Carthage, grew in a ſhort ſpace from ſmall beginnings to great glory and riches. The plentie and luxurie thereof was ſo great, as it cauſed Empedocles to ſay, That the Agrigentines built Palaces of ſuch ſumptuoſitie, as if they meant to liue for euer; and made ſuch feaſts as if they meant to die the next day. But their greateſt pompe and magnificence, was in their goodly temples, and theaters, water-conduits, and fiſh-ponds: the ruines whereof at this day are ſufficient arguments, that Rome it ſelfe could neuer boaſt of the like. In the Porch of the temple of Iupiter Olympus, (by which wee may iudge of the temple it ſelfe) there was ſet out on one ſide the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in poliſhed marble of diuers colours; a worke the moſt magnificent and rare, that euer hath beene ſeene: on the other ſide the warre of Troy, and the encounters which hapned either ſiege; with the perſonages of the Heroes that were doers in that warre; all of the like beautifull ſtone, & of equall ſtature to the bodies of thoſe men in ancient times: In compariſon of which, the latter workes of that kinde, are but pettie things, and meere trifles. It would require a volume to expreſſe the magnificence of the temples of Hercules, AEſculapius, Concord, Iuno Lucina, Chaſtitie, Proſerpina, Caſtor and Pollux; wherein the Maſter-peeces of thoſe exquiſite Painters, and Caruers, Phidias, Xeuxis, Myron, and Polycletus, were to beſeene. But in proceſſe of time it ranne the ſame fortune that all other great Cities haue done, and was ruined by diuers calamities of warre: whereof this warre preſent brought vnto it not the leaſt.

Romans

Romans, the better to assure themselues, cut a deepe trench, betweene the walls of the Citie and their Campe: and another on the out-side thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any suddenly, by a sallie, nor those of the Countrie without, breake vpon them vnawares: which double defence kept the besieged also from the receiuing any reliefe of victualls, and munitions, whilest the Siracusian supplies the assailants with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage: after they had beene in this sort pent vp fiue moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, vnder the command of Hanno; who arriues with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbesus, a Citie wherein the Romanes had bestowed all their prouision. By meanes heereof, the famine without grew to bee as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Romane campe no lesse streightly assieged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romanes: insomuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had beene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise; Hanno determined to giue them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclea, hee makes approach vnto the Roman campe. The Romans resolue to sustaine him, and put themselues in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horsemen to charge the Vantguard, to the ende to draw them further on; which done, hee commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behinde some rising ground. The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romanes pursued the Numidians, Hanno giues vpon them, and hauing slaughtered many, beates the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly incamped, waiting vntill some opportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal that was besieged in Agrigentum, as well by signes as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremitie which he endured, was able to brooke such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Consuls to fight: But his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vantguard, which was broken by the Romanes, he lost the day: and with such as escaped, he recouered Heraclea. Annibal perceiuing this, and remaining hopelesse of succor, resolued to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; hee rusht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without resistance. The Consulls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine: sure they were, that hee could not carry the Citie with him, which with little a-doe the Romans entred, and pittifully spoyled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purposed rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolued in the beginning of this Warre, onely to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts: but now they determine to make themselues Lords of all Sicil; and from thence, being fauoured with the winde of good successe, to saile ouer into Africke. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and also of priuate men, to couet the greatest things, but not to enioy the least; the desire of that which we neither haue nor neede, taking from vs the true vse and fruition of what wee haue alreadie. This curse vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them since the beginning of the World vnto this day.

To prosecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius and Titus Otacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicil. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-land Townes gaue themselues vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritimate places became theirs. The Romanes therefore, as well to secure their owne coasts, often inuaded by the African fleets, as also to equall themselues in euery kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And heerein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that beeing altogether ignorant in ship-wrights craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of fiue bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romanes a patterne, and by it they beganne to set vp an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by fiue on euery banke, and twenty, of three on a banke: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-sands many many seates, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men; and taught them to beat the sand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted; C. Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed euery yeere) was made Admirall: who being more in loue with this new kinde of warfare, then well aduised, past ouer to Messina with seuenteene Gallies, leauing the rest to follow him. There hee staied not, but would needs row along the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of seruice. Hannibal, a Carthaginian was at the same time Gouernour in Panormus; who being aduertised of this new Sea mans arriuall, sent foorth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twentie Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Consull vnawares, tooke both him and the fleet hee commanded. When Hannibal receiued this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consull; hee grew no lesse foolish hardie than Cornelius had beene. For hee, fancying to himselfe to surprize the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points prouided; sought them out with a fleete of fiftie saile: wherewith falling among them, hee was well beaten, and leauing the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans vnder Cornelius had lost but seuenteene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fiftie.

The Romans, being aduertised of Cornelius his ouerthrow, make haste to redeeme him, but giue the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius. Duilius, considering that the Roman vessels were heauie and slow, the African Gallies hauing the speed of them, deuised a certaine Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselues with their enemies, when they were (as wee call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the waighties ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serue them, nor their Mariners craft; the Vessels wherein both Nations fought, being open: so that all was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heauier Gallies were accidentally likely to crush and cracke the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by the reason of their breadth, more steadie; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vse their hands. The example may be giuen betweene one of the long boates of his Maiesties great ships, and a London barge.

Certainely, hee that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must bee skilfull in making choice of Vessels to fight in: he must beleeue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great during; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betweene fighting loose or at large, and grapling. The Gunnes of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre: for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Strosse, lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, beene lost in the yeere 1588. if hee had not beene better aduised, than a great many malignant fooles were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armie aboord them; and he had none: they had more ships then he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himselfe with those great and powerfull Vessells, he had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselues withall. But our Admirall knew his aduantage, and held it: which had he not done, he had not beene worthy to haue held his head. Heere to speake in generall of Sea-fight (for particulars are fitter for priuate hands then for the Presse,) I say, That a fleete of twentie shippes, all good sailers, and good ships, haue the aduantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred saile keepe themselues neere together, in a grosse squadron, the twentie ships, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to giue ground, and to fall backe vpon their owne next fellowes: of which so many as intangle, are made vnseruiceable or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twentie ships, which giue themselues scope, after they haue giuen one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and staying, they may giue them the other: and so the twentie ships batter them in pieces with a perpetuall vollie; whereas those, that fight in a troope, haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies vse but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred saile giue themselues any distance, then shall the lesser fleet preuaile, either against those that are a-reare & hindmost, or against those, that by aduantage of ouer-sailing their fellowes keepe the winde: and if vpon a Lee-shore, the ships next the winde bee constrained to fall backe into their owne squadron, then it is all to nothing, the whole fleet must suffer shipwracke, or render it selfe. That such aduantage may be taken vpon a fleet of vnequall speed, it hath bin well enough conceiued in olde time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians inuaded them, it may easily bee obserued.

* If wee may giue credit to Antiquities, which Fazellus, a diligent writer hath left vs in his Historie of Sicil, Panormus, now called Palermo, is one of the first Cities that hath been built in all Europe. For whereas Thucydides seemes to make it a Colonie of the Phœnicians; Ranzanus, in libello de Panormo, lib. 3. affirmes that it was first, and long before the time which Thucydides sets down, founded by the Chaldæans, & Damascenes. To prooue which, hee tels vs of two inscriptions vpō marble in the Hebrew Character found at Panormus in the time of William the second, King of Sicil, that were then beheld of al the Citizens & other strāgers; which being translated into Latine, say as followeth: Viuente Isaac filio Abraha, & regnante in Idumæa, atq; in Valle Damascena, Esau filio Isaac; ingens Hebræorū manus, quibus adiūcti sunt multi Damasceni, atq; Phœnices, profecti in hanc triangularem Insulam, sedes perpetuas locauerunt in hoc amœnissimo loco, quem Panormū nominauerunt. In the other marble are found these words: Non est alius Deus præter unum Deum: non est alius potens præter eundem Deum, &c. Hunus Turris Præfectus est Sephu filius Eliphaz, filij Esau, fratris Lucob filij Isaac, filij Abrahams: & Turri quidem oppidum est Bayeh; sed Turri huic proxima nomen est Pharah. And this inscription (saith Fazellus) was found intire in the Castle Bayeh, in the yeare 1534. Now whether these inscriptions were truely as ancient, as these men beleeue they were, I leaue euery man to his owne faith. But that the City was of aged times, it appeares by Thucydides, who affirmeth; when the Greekes past first into Sicil, that then the Phœnicians inhabited Panormus: which certaine it is they did in the first Punick warre; to wit, the Carthaginians, who were Phœnicians, from whom the Romans (A. Agustus, & C. Cornelius, commanding this Armie) tooke it. And when Marcellus besieged Syracuse, it sent him in ayde 7000. Souldiers. But it was rather confederate, than subiect to the Romans. For Cicero against Verres, names it among the free Cities of Sicil. After Syracuse destroyed, it became the first Citie and Regall seat, as well of the Goths and Saracens in that Iland, as of the Emperours of Constantinople; of the Normans, French, and Arragonians; which honour it holds to this day, and is much frequented, for the excellent wine which growes about it.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a subiect, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient or moderne: but God hath spared mee the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that braue Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sunne, we shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall words and sorrowes; I will therefore leaue him in the hands of God that hath him. Curæ leues loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by losing their aduantage of swift boats, & boording the Romans, haue lost fiftie saile of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, haue gotten libertie to saile about the West part of Sicil; where they raised the siege layed vnto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places.

§. VII.

Diuers enterfeats of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe. The Romans prepare to inuade Africk: and obtaine a great victory at Sea.

THe victorie of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Nauall triumph, that was euer seene in that Citie; so gaue it vnto the Romans a great incouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not onely to get Sicil, but all the other Iles betweene Italie and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither soone after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune: and being aduertised, that some quarrell was grown betweene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incampe a-part, he sent forth Hanno to set vpon them; who taking them vnawares, buried foure thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Sicil, Hannibal, who had lately beene beaten by Sea, but escaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former errour, obtained the trust of a new fleet, wherewith hee arriued at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertained for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Seas from Sicil, arriued in the port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They set vpon him vnawares, and tooke the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himselfe hardly escaping the danger. But it little auailed him to haue escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second vnfortunate voyage, that they hanged him vp for his diligence: for (as it hath been said of old) Non est bis in bello peccare; In warre it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls, till Panormus was besieged: where, when the Romans had sought in vaine to draw the Carthaginians ginians into the field; being vnable to force that great Citie, becauſe of the ſtrong Garriſon therein beſtowed: they then departed from thence, and tooke certaine In-land Townes, as Mytiſtratum, Enna, Camerina, Hippana, and others, betweene Panormus and Meſſana.

The yeare following, C. Atilius the Conſul, who commanded the Roman fleet, diſcouered a company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coaſt: and, not ſtaying for his whole number, purſued them with ten of his. But hee was well beaten for the haſte hee made, and loſt all, ſaue the Gallie which tranſported him: wherein himſelfe eſcaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the reſt of Atilius his fleet was gotten vp: who renewing the fight, recouered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the victory remaining doubtfull, both challenge it. Now to try at once, which of theſe two Nations ſhould command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred and thirty Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fiftie, * Triremes, Quadriremes, and Quinqueremes.

The Romans reſolue to tranſport the warre into Africk, the Carthaginians, to arreſt them on the coaſt of Sicil. The numbers, with which each of them filled their fleete, was (perhaps) the greateſt that euer fought on the waters. By Polybius his eſtimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thouſand men; and in thoſe of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thouſand: reckoning one hundred and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred rowers to euery Gallie, one with the other. The Roman fleete was diuided into foure parts, of which the three firſt made the forme of a Wedge or Triangle; the two firſt ſquadrons making the Flancks, and the third ſquadron, the Baſe: the point thereof (wherein were the two Conſulls as Admiralls) looking toward the enemie, and the middle ſpace lying emptie. Their Veſſells of carriage were towed by the third ſquadron. After all came vp the fourth, in forme of a Creſcent; very well manned, but exceeding thinne: ſo that the hornes of it incloſed all the third ſquadron, together with the corners of the firſt and ſecond. The order of the Carthaginian fleete I cannot conceiue by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I coniecture, that the front of their fleet was thinne, and ſtretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en haij; a long front of horſe, and thinne: which forme, ſince the Piſtoll preuailed ouer the Lance, they haue changed. Behinde this firſt outſtretched front, their Battalions were more ſolide: for Amilcar, Admirall of the Carthaginians, had thus ordered them, of purpoſe, (his Gallies hauing the ſpeed of the Romans) that, when the firſt fleet of the Romans haſted to breake through the firſt Gallies, they ſhould all turne taile, and the Romanes purſuing them (as after a victory) diſorder themſelues, and, for eagerneſſe of taking the Run-awaies, leaue their owne three ſquadrons farre behinde them. For ſo it muſt needs fall out; ſeeing that the third ſquadron towed their horſe boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Reareward of all. According to Amilcars direction it ſucceeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinne front of the Carthaginian firſt fleet, which ranne away, they forthwith gaue after them with all ſpeed poſſible, not ſo much as looking behinde them for the ſecond ſquadron. Hereby the Romans were drawne neere vnto the body of the Carthaginian fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (at the firſt) receiued a great loſſe, vntill their ſecond ſquadron came vp, which forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oares. Hanno alſo, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleete, inuaded the Romane Reareward, and preuailed againſt them. But Amilcar beeing beaten off, Marcus Atilius fell backe to their ſuccour, and put the Carthaginians to their heeles; as not able to ſuſtain both ſquadrons. The Reare being relieued, the Conſuls came to the aide of their third Battalion, which towed the victuallers, which was alſo in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: but the Conſuls, ioyning their ſquadrons to it, put the Carthaignians on that part alſo to running.

This victorie fell vnto the Romanes, partly by the hardineſſe of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, beeing firſt beaten, could neuer after ioyne himſelfe vnto any of his other ſquadrons, that remained as yet in a faire likelihood of preuailing, ſo long as they fought vpon equall termes, and but ſquadron to ſquadron. But Amilcar forſaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Romane fleete vnengaged, and readie to giue ſuccour to any of the other parts that were oppreſt. So as in concluſion, the Romanes got the honour of the day: for they loſt but foure and

* The Quinqueremes are Gallies, wherin euery Oare hath fiue men to draw it: the Quadriremes had foure to an Oare: and the Triremes, three. Some haue thought, that the Quinqueremes had fiue rankes of Oares, one ouer another; & the other Gallies (rateably) fewer. But had this beene ſo, they muſt the haue had fiue deckes each ouer other: which hath ſeldome beene ſeen in ſhips of a thouſand Tunns, neither could the third, fourth, & fifte rankes, haue reached vnto the water with the Oares.

twentie of theirs; whereas the Africans loſt thirtie that were ſunke, and threeſcore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had alſo diuided his fleete into foure ſquadrons, (beſides thoſe that hee ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that, whileſt hee himſelfe fought with one ſquadron that charged him, all the reſt of the enemies fleete had beene at the ſame time entertained, hee had preuailed: But the ſecond ſquadron, being free, came to the reſcue of the firſt, by which Amilcar was oppreſt: and Amilcar, being oppreſt and ſcattered, the Conſuls had good leiſure to relieue both the third and the fourth ſquadron, and got the victorie.

Charles the fift, among other his Precepts to Philip the ſecond his ſonne, where hee aduiſeth him concerning Warre againſt the Turkes, tells him, that in all battailes betweene them and the Chriſtians, he ſhould neuer faile to charge the Ianiſars in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the reſt. For (ſaith he) the Ianiſars, who are alwaies reſerued intire in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turke repoſeth his greateſt confidence; come vp in a groſſe body, when all the troops, on both ſides are disbanded and in confuſion; whereby they carrie the victorie before them without reſiſtance. By the ſame order of fight, and reſeruation, did the Romans alſo preuaile againſt other Nations. For they kept their Triarij in ſtore (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-ſhot and laſt blow. A great and victorious aduantage it hath euer been found, to keepe ſome one or two good troopes to looke on, when all elſe are diſbanded and ingaged.

§. VIII.

The Romanes preuaile in Africk. Atilius the Conſull propoundeth intollerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is vtterly beaten, and made priſoner.

NOw the Romans according to their former reſolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their fleet, ſet ſaile for Africa, and arriued at the Promontorie of Hercules, a great Head-land, ſomewhat to the Eaſt of the Port of Carthage, and ſome fortie leagues from Heraclea in Sicil, where Amilcar himſelfe as yet ſtaid. From this Head-land (leauing the entrance into Carthage) they coaſted the Eaſt-ſide of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea; a Towne about fiftie Engliſh mile from it. There they diſ-embarked, and prepared to beſiege Clypea; which, to eaſe them of labour, was yeelded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa ſide; without which all inuaſions are fooliſh. By this time were the Africans alſo arriued at their owne Carthage; fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themſelues thither: but being aduertiſed that they had taken Clypea, they made prouiſions of all ſorts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans ſend to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waſte all round about them. The order giuen from the Senate, was, that one of the Conſulls ſhould remaine with the Armie, and that the other ſhould returne, with the fleet into Italie. According to this direction, Manlius the Conſull is ſent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twenty thouſand African Captaines, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ſhips, fifteene thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe, that were left with Atilius.

With theſe forces, Regulus eaſily wanne ſome Townes and Places that were vnwalled, and laid ſiege to others. But hee performed no great matter, before hee came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere vnto the Riuer of Bagrada, hee encountred with a Serpent of one hundred and twenty foot long, which he ſlue, not without loſſe of many Souldiers, being driuen to vſe againſt it ſuch engines of warre, as ſerued properly for the aſſaulting of Townes. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Armie, whereof the Captaines were Hanno and Boſtar, together with Amilcar, who had brought ouer out of Sicil fiue thouſand foote, and fiue hundred horſe to ſuccour his Countrie. Theſe (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were carefull to hold themſelues free, from neceſſitie of comming to blowes: yet had they a great deſire, to ſaue the Towne of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpoſe, and yet to diſturbe him in the ſiege of Adis; they incampe neere vnto him, and ſtrongly ſtrongly (as they thinke) on the top of an hill: but thereby they looſe the ſeruices, both of their Elephants, and of their horſe-men. This diſaduantage of theirs Regulus diſcouers, and makes vſe of it. He aſſailes them in their ſtrength, which they defend a-while, but in fine the Romans preuaile, & force them from the place, taking the ſpoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceed to Tunis a Citie within ſixteene miles of Carthage, which they aſſault and take.

By the loſſe of this battaile at Adis, and more eſpecially by the loſſe of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly diſmaied. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the Weſt, inſult vpon their misfortunes, inuade, and ſpoile their Territory, and force thoſe that inhabite abroad, to forſake their villages and fields, and to hide themſelues within the walls of Carthage. By reaſon hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius findes his owne aduantage, and aſſures himſelfe that the Citie could not long hold out: yet hee feared leſt it might defend it ſelfe, vntill his time of Office, that was neere expired, ſhould bee quite runne out; whereby the new Conſulls were like to reape the honor of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no reſpect but to it ſelfe, perſwades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But hee propounded vnto them ſo vnworthy and baſe conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly poſſeſſed with feare, became now ſo couragious and diſdainfull, that they reſolued, either to defend their libertie, or die to the laſt man. To ſtrengthen this their reſolution, there arriued at the ſame time a great troope of Greekes, whom they had formerly ſent to entertaine. Among theſe was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had paſſed, and of the ouerthrow which the Carthaginians receiued neere vnto Adis, gaue it out publikely, that the ſame was occaſioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ranne, till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is ſent for; giues the reaſon of his opinion; and in concluſion, being made Generall of the African forces, he puts himſelfe into the field. The Armie which he led, conſiſted of no more then twelue thouſand foot, and foure thouſand horſe, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had; Libertie, Liues, Goods, Wiues, and Children: which might well make it ſuſpected, that the Armies by Sea, before ſpoken of, were miſſe-numbred; the one conſiſting of an hundred and forty thouſand, and the other of an hundred and fiftie thouſand: were it not commonlie found that they which vſe the ſeruice of mercinarie Souldiers, are ſtronger abroad, than at their owne dores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his troups vpon faire and leuell ground, fitteſt both for his Elephants and Horſe, preſented them battaile. The Romanes wondered much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were, that it ſhould ſoone bee abated. Their chiefe care was, how to reſiſt the violence of the Elephants. Againſt them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorne hope; that theſe might, either with darts and other caſting weapons, driue backe the beaſts vpon the enemies, or at leaſt breake their violence, and hinder them from ruſhing freelie vpon the Legions. To the ſame end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had beene accuſtomed to doe. By which meanes, as they were the leſſe ſubiect vnto the impreſſion of the Elephants; ſo were they ſo much the more expoſed vnto the violence of horſe, wherein the Enemie did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke; before his Armie, which followed them at a reaſonable diſtance: his horſemen, and ſome light-armed foote, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The firſt onſet was giuen by the Elephants, againſt which the Velites were ſo vnable to make reſiſtance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into ſome diſorder. In this caſe, the depth of the Romane battaile was helpfull. For when the beaſts had ſpent their force, in piercing through a few of the firſt rankes; the ſquadrons neuertheleſſe perſiſted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horſe, hauing at the firſt encounter, by reaſon of their aduantage in number, driuen thoſe of Atilius out of the fielde, beganne to charge the Romane battalions in flanke, and put them in great diſtreſſe; who being forced to turne face euery way, could neither paſſe forward nor yet retire; but had very much adoe to make good the ground whereon they ſtood. In the meane while, ſuch of the Romanes, as had eſcaped the furie of the Elephants, and left them at their backes, fell vpon the Carthaginian Armie, that met them in very good array. It was no euen match. The one were a disordered Companie, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to haue dealt with the enemie vpon equall termes. Heere was therefore a greater slaughter with little fight; the Romanes hastily recoyling to the bodie of their Armie, which being surrounded with the enemie, and spent with trauaile, fell all to rout, vpon the defeat of these troupes, that open the way to a generall ouerthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victorie; destroying the whole Romane Armie, saue two thousand, and taking fiue hundred prisoners, together with Atilius the Consull. Of their owne they lost no more then eight hundred mercenaries, which were slaine, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romanes: that wheeling about to auoid the Elephants, bare downe all before them, and made way euen to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romanes know, that they were no lesse her vassals, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent soeuer they had beene in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which shee neuer gaue nor sold to any mortall man. With what ioy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, wee may easily coniecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to proue, no lesse then this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of Eurypides, Mens vna Sapiens, plurium vincit manus; Many mens hands equall not one wise minde.

* This City was taken frō the Turkes by Charles the fift in the yeere 1536 and was one of the three Keyes, which he gaue in charge to Philip the ſecond his ſonne to keepe ſafe; to wit, this Tunis, the Key of Africa: Elſtinge, the Key of the Netherlandes: and Cadiz, the Key of Spaine. But two of theſe Philip ſo loſt, that hee neuer found them againe; the third, our Engliſh were bold, in the time of the renowned Queen Elizabeth, to wring out of his hands: where wee ſtaid not to picke any lock, but brake open the dores and hauing rifled all threw it into the fire.

After this great seruice done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether for that hee was more enuied then honoured, or for what other cause, it is vnknowne.

The death of Atilius Regulus the Consull, was very memorable. Hee was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransome of prisoners on both sides: giuing his faith to returne if the businesse were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainelie saw that his Countrie should lose by the bargaine: so farre was he from vrging the Senate vnto compassion of his owne miserie, that hee earnestly perswaded to haue the prisoners in Africke left to their ill destinies. This done, hee returned to Carthage: where for his paines taken, hee was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seeme to haue iudged him an obstinate and malicious enemie; that neither in his prosperitie would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturall care, to preserue himselfe and others, by yeelding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not grounded vpon deadly hatred) onely in regard of some small aduantage. Whatsoeuer the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is, that his faithfull obseruance of his word giuen, cannot be too much commended. But that graue speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appeares, in all reason, to haue proceeded from a vaine-glorious frowardnesse, rather than from any necessitie of State. For the exchange was made soone after his death; wherein the Romanes had the worse bargaine, by so much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authoritie of all Historians, that magnifie him in this point; we are to consider that they liued vnder the Roman Empire: Plinius, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which hee suffered with extreame torments, could not be more grieuous to him than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither doe I thinke that the Carthaginians could excuse themselues herein; otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romanes deserued to be no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinary practice to vse others in the like sort. Crueltie doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customarie. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they tooke, yea although they were such as had alwaies made faire warres with them. Wherefore it seemes not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannicall insolencie in others, as if it were lawfull onely in themselues.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Atilius his intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians feare was changed by meere desperation; calls to remembrance, the like insolencie of others in prosperitie, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath beene beene denied. In such cases I neuer hold it impertinent, to adde vnto one, more testimonies approuing the true rules, from which our passions carry vs away.

In the yeere 1378. the Genowaies wonne so fast vpon the Venetians, as they not onely draue their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice it selfe. This bred such an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered vnto the Genowaies (their State reserued) whatsoeuer they would demand. But Peter Doria, blowne vp with many former victories, would harken to no composition; saue the yeelding of their Citie and State to his discretion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with disdaine, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and assaile Doria with such desperate furie, that they breake his fleet, kill Doria himselfe, take nineteene of his Gallies, fourescore boats of Padoa, and foure thousand prisoners; recouer Chiozza, and all the places taken from them; and following their victory, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genowaies, basely to begge peace, to their extreame dishonour and disaduantage, being beaten; which, being victorious, they might haue commanded, to their greatest honour and aduantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flanders, in the yeere 1380. when hauing taken a notable, and withall an ouer-cruell reuenge vpon the Gantois, hee refused mercy to the rest, who in all humilitie, submitting themselues to his obedience, offered their Citie, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when hee had vnaduisedly refused, and was resolued to extinguish them vtterly; they issue out of their Citie with fiue thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earle, breake his Armie, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himselfe vnder an heape of straw, in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficultie he escaped, and saued himselfe. Such are the fruits of insolencie.

How the affaires of Carthage prospered after the victorie against Atilius: How the Romans hauing lost their fleet by tempest, resolue to forsake the Seas: The great aduantages of a good fleet in warre, betweene Nations diuided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late victory, all places that had beene lost in Africke, returne to the obedience of Carthage. Onely Clypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit downe, and assaile it, but in vaine: For the Romans, hearing of the losse of Atilius with their forces in Africke, and withall, that Clypea was besieged, make ready a grosse Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fiftie Gallies, commanded by M. Æmilius, and Ser. Fuluius, their Consulls. At the Promontory of Mercurie, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, vpon the bruit of their comming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans tooke by force an hundred and foureteene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had beene besieged: and this done, they made amaine toward Sicil, in hope to recouer all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty voyage they despise the aduice of the Pilots, who pray them to finde harbour in time, for that the season threatned some violent stormes, which euer hapned betweene the rising of Orion, and of the * Dog-starre. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleete had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withall, that the South coast of Sicil had no good Ports, wherein to saue themselues vpon such an accident: yet this victorious Nation was perswaded, that the winde and seas feared them no lesse, than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer the Elements themselues. So refusing to stay within some Port, as they were aduised, they would needes put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this victory against the Carthaginian fleet, to take a few worthlesse Townes vpon the coast. The mercilesse windes in the meane while ouertake them, and neere vnto Camerina, ouerturne and thrust headlong on the rocks, all but fourescore of three hundred and forty ships: so as their former great victory was deuoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recouered Rome.

* There is no Part of the World, which hath not some certaine times of outragious weather besids their accidentall storms. We haue vpon our coast a Michaelmas flaw, that seldome or neuer failes: In the west Indies, in the moneths of August and September, those most forcible winds, which the Spaniards call the Nortes, or Northwindes, are very fearefull: and therefore they that Navigate in those parts, take harbour till those months take end. Charles the fift being ill aduised, in passing the Seas towards Algere, in the Winter quarter, contrary to the counsaile of A. Doria, as he was in like vnseasonable time to continue his siege before Metz, in Lorraine, lost an hundred and fortie ships by tempest, and fifteene Gallies, with all in effect in them, of men, victualles, horses, and munition: a losse no lesse great, than hit at that, both from before the one and the other, was extreame dishonourable.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike Vessels, hoping once againe to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land-forces since the ouerthrow of Atilius. They send Asdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortie Elephants, inbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armie and fleet he arriues at Lilybæum; where he begins to vexe the Partisans of Rome. But aduersitie doth not discourage the Romanes: They build in three monethis (a matter of great note) one hundred and twenty ships; with which, and the remainder of their late shipwracke, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicil, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leauing a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to be doing in Africk: to which purpose they imploied C. Seruilius, and C. Sempronius, their Consulls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoile they made vpon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their returne, they were first set vpon the sands, and like to haue perished, neere vnto the lesser Syrtes, where they were faine to heaue all ouer-boord, that so they might get off: then, hauing with much a doe doubled the Cape of Lilybæum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italie, they lost an hundred and fiftie of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the god of the warres fauoured them no more, than the god of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enriched them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, foure hundred and sixe Ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby receiued, perswaded them to giue ouer their Nauigation, and their fight by Sea, and to send onely a Land-armie into Sicil, vnder L. Cæcilius, and F. Furius, their Consuls. These they transported in some threescore ordinary passage-boats, by the streights of Messana, that are not aboue a mile and a halfe broad from land to land. In like sort, the ouerthrow which Atilius receiued in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholericke against the Carthaginians, than before; so that for two yeeres after, they kept the high and wooddie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champian Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicil, without a Nauie, much lesse to maintaine the warre in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilybæum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicil, making sometimes a march of aboue an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Armie, and the prouisions that follow it, in lesse than foureteene daies, the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies, in eight and fortie houres.

An old example we haue, of that great aduantage of transporting Armies by water, betweene Canutus, and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Nauie and Armie, and could not preuaile against London, suddenly imbarqued, and sailing to the West, landed in Dorset-shire, so drawing Edmond and his Army thither. There finding ill entertainement, he againe shipt his men, and entred the Seuerne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcestershire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he sailed backe againe to London: by meanes whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arriue. And this was not the least helpe, which the Netherlands haue had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their liberty, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Armie from place to place, vnwearied, and entire, with all the Munition and Artilerie belonging vnto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies haue beene able to doe it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now liuing, one of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Ages haue brought forth, in the yeare 1590. carried his Armie by Sea, with fortie Canons, to Breda: making countenance either to besiege Boisleduc, or Gertreuiden Berg; which the enemie (in preuention) filled with Souldiers, and victualls. But as soone as the winde serued, he suddenly set saile, arriuing in the mouth of the Meuze, turned vp the Rhine, and thence to Tssel, and sat downe before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could could march ouer-land round about Holland, aboue foureſcore mile, and ouer many great Riuers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Againe, when the Spaniſh Armie had ouercome this wearisome march, and were now farre from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to saile vp the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and sailing downe the streame, he was set downe before Hulst in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Towne he also tooke, before the Spaniſh armie could returne. Lastly, the Spaniſh armie was so sooner arriued in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, hauing fortified Hulst, set saile againe, and presented himselfe before Nymegen in Gelders, a Citie of notable importance, and mastred it.

And to say the truth; it is impossible for any maritime Countrie, not hauing the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it selfe against a powerfull enemy, that is master of the Sea: Hereof I had rather, that Spaine than England should be an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolued to hinder Sir Iohn Norris in the yeare 1589. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lysborne; and that he would haue kept off the Engliſh, by power of his land-forces; as being too weake at Sea, through the great ouerthrow of his mighty Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the yeere foregoing. Surely, it had not beene hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that should be able to resist our eleuen thousand. But where should this his Armie haue beene bestowed? If about Lysborne; then would it haue beene easie vnto the Engliſh, to take, ransacke, and burne the Towne of Groine, and to waste the Countrie round about it. For the great and threatning preparations of the Earle of Altemira, the Marqueſſe of Seralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the hastie leauie of eight thousand, vnder the Earle of Andrada, serue to more effect, than the increase of honour to Sir Iohn Norris, and his Associates: considering, that the Engliſh charged these, at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them, tooke their campe; tooke their Generals standard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them ouer all the Countrie, which they fired. If a royall Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of priuate aduenturers, had thus begun the warre in Galicia; I thinke it would haue made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugale, and make haste to the defence of their S^t. Iago, whose Temple was not far from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir Iohn Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armie, into his Kingdome, whither comming strong, he expected to be readily and ioyfully welcomed: could they haue hindred his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Penicha, and march ouer the Countrey to Lysborne, sixe dayes iourney? Did not hee (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) passe along by the Riuer of Lysborne to Cascaliz, and there, hauing won the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Engliſhmen. Let vs consider of the matter it selfe; what another Nation might doe, euen against England, in landing an Armie, by aduantage of a fleet, if we had none. This question, Whether an inuading Armie may be resisted at their landing vpon the coast of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his obseruations vpon Cæsars Commentaries, that maintaines the affirmatiue. This he holds onely vpon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatiuely, as that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keep our enemy from treading vpon our ground: wherein, if we faile, then must we seeke to make him wish, that he had staied at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our iudgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question generall, and positiue, Whether England, without helpe of her fleete, be able to debarre an enemie from landing; I hold that it is vnable so to doe: and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the aduenture. For the incouragement of a first victory to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the inuaded, may draw after it a most perilous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Monluc, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to haue kept the frontier of Guienne, they of the

Proteſtant

Proteſtant religion, after the battaile of Moncounter, entred that Countrie, and gathered great ſtrength and reliefe thence; for if the King (ſaith he) would haue giuen me but reaſonable meanes, ieuſe bien garde a Monſieur l' Admiral, de faire boire ſes Cheuaux en la Garonne; I would haue kept the Admiral from watering his horſes in the Riuer of Garonne. Monſieur de Langey, on the contrary ſide, preferres the not fighting vpon a frontier with an inuading enemy, and commends the delay; which courſe the Conſtable of France held, againſt the Emperour Charles, when he inuaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is, and a diuerſe conſideration to be had, betweene ſuch a Countrie as France is, ſtrengthned with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inuaſions vpon firme land, that theſe great Captaines ſpake: whoſe entrances cannot be vncertaine. But our queſtion is, of an Armie to be tranſported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Country, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I ſay, That ſuch an Armie cannot be reſiſted on the coaſt of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coaſt of France, or any other Countrey: except euery Creeke, Port, or ſandy Bay, had a powerfull Armie, in each of them, to make oppoſition. For let his whole ſuppoſition be granted; That Kent is able to furniſh twelue thouſand foot, and that thoſe twelue thouſand be layed in the three beſt landing places within that Countrey, to wit, three thouſand at Margat, three thouſand at the Neſſe, and ſixe thouſand at Foulkſton, that is ſomewhat equally diſtant from them both; as alſo that two of theſe troupes (vnleſſe ſome other order be thought more fit) be directed to ſtrengthen the third, when they ſhall ſee the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I ſay, that notwithſtanding this prouiſion, if the enemy, ſetting ſaile from the Iſle of Wight, in the firſt watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their ſternes, ſhall arriue by dawne of day at the Neſſe, and thruſt their Armie on ſhore there; it will be hard for thoſe three thouſand that are at Margat, (twenty and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellowes at the Neſſe. Nay, how ſhall they at Foulkſton be able to doe it, who are neerer by more than halfe the way? ſeeing that the enemie, at his firſt arriuall, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred ſhot of great Artillery, and quickely put the firſt three thouſand, that were intrenched at the Neſſe, to runne; or elſe giue them ſo much to doe, that they ſhall be glad to ſend for helpe to Foulkſton, and perhaps to Margat: whereby thoſe places will be left bare. Now let vs ſuppoſe, that all the twelue thouſand Kentiſh Souldiers arriue at the Neſſe, ere the enemy can be ready to diſimbarque his Armie, ſo that he ſhall finde it vnſafe, to land in the face of ſo many, prepared to withſtand him; yet muſt we beleeue, that he will play the beſt of his owne game; and (hauing liberty to goe which way he liſt) vnder couert of the night, ſet ſayle towards the Eaſt, where what ſhall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elſewhere, before they at the Neſſe can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more eaſie than to doe it. Yea the like may be ſaid of Waymouth, Parbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coaſt. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themſelues out of breath, will eaſily outrun the Souldiers that coaſt them. Les Armees ne volent point en poſte; Armies neither flye, nor run poſt, ſaith a Marſhall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleete of Ships may be ſeene at Sunne-ſet, and after it, at the Liſard; yet by the next morning they may recouer Portland, whereas an Armie of foot ſhall not be able to march it in ſixe dayes. Againe, when thoſe troupes, lodged on the Sea-ſhores, ſhall be forced to run from place to place in vaine, after a fleet of Ships, they will at length ſit downe in the mid-way, and leaue all at aduenture. But ſay it were otherwiſe; That the inuading enemy will offer to land in ſome ſuch place, where there ſhall be an Army of ours ready to receiue him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, ſhall be drawn together (as they were at Tilburie in the yeere 1588.) to attend the perſon of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coaſt, can be of no ſuch force, as to encounter an Armie like vnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma ſhould haue landed in England.

The Iſle of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in ſuch a caſe. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and ſtrengthned by art: it being euery where hard of acceſſe; hauing no good harbour wherein to ſhelter a Nauie of of friends; and vpon euery coue or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylua, and Monsieur de Chattes, that held it to the vse of Don Antonio, with fiue or sixe thousand men, thought to haue kept the Marquesse of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marquesse hauing shewed himselfe in the Roade of Angra, did set saile, ere any was aware of it, and arriued at the Port des Moles, farre distant from thence, where he wan a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chattes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Strossie, slaine the yeere before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chattes and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our English would be perswaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and backe againe, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not measured the one halfe when they found themselues preuented by the more nimble ships of Spaine.

This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England, France, or elsewhere, vnlesse it be hindred, encountred, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the yeere 1597. is alleaged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal, my selfe, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may by a ciuill interpretation, think, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprize was such, or so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeede some which were in that voyage, who aduised me not to vndertake it: and I harkened vnto them, somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilest they desired me, to reserue the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty: I gaue them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, then to inuade it. The truth is, that I could haue landed my men with more ease then I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would haue rowed to another place, yea euen there where I landed, if I would haue taken more company to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong vnto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Ilanders should not thinke any aduantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Countrie Captaines, and others, not of mine owne squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselues with a sweet conceit (though it would haue been short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driuen to turne taile. Therefore I tooke with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine owne squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harney, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Shot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Thinne, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnderstood themselues and the enemie: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I vndertooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepenesse of the Cliffes, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made fiue or sixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Musketiers lay on the rest for vs, and won the place of them without any great losse. This I could haue done with lesse danger, so that it should not haue serued for example of a rule, that failed euen in this example: but the reasons before alleaged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen aboue named, though more priuate, then to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of brauery, and take the shorter course; hauing it still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemie was more then a Coward, (which yet was more then we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small peece of seruice, by seeking to proue him better: whom had I thought thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise haue dealt with. But for so much as concernes the Proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he sought how to stop vs in place of his aduantage; that many of our men were slaine or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to be past, when we had won good footing) would needs follow vs to the Towne, were driuen by him, to forsake the pace of a man of war, and betake themselues to an hastie trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall; his Maiesties many moueable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdaine, than any Nation vnder heauen can doe, to be beaten vpon their owne ground, or elsewhere by a forraigne enemy; yet to entertaine those that shall assaile vs, with their owne beefe in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To doe which, his Maiesty, after God, will imploy his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment vpon the shore.

§. X.

How the Romans attempt againe to get the mastrie of the Seas. The victory of Cæcilius the Roman Consull at Panormus: The siege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gallie entred Lilybæum at pleasure, in despight of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grieuous losses receiued, vnder Claudius and Iunius their Consuls, abandon the Seas againe.

WHen, without a strong Nauie, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keepe what they had already gotten in Sicil, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elsewhere, they resolued once againe, notwithstanding their late misaduentures, to strengthen their fleet and ships of warre. So causing fiftie new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consuls, C. Atilius, and L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiuing that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwracke which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they receiued by Xantippus in Africa, were lesse daring than they had beene in the beginning of the warre: and withall, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italie, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cæcilius, with onely the other halfe, remained at Panormus: he remoued with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Consull was better aduised. For when Asdrubal had made his approches somewhat neere the Towne, Cæcilius caused a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattaile a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gaue order that they should aduance themselues, and passe ouer the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees, till they had drawne on the Elephants to the brinke of the new trench, which they could by no means passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake backe furiously vpon their owne foot-men, and vtterly disordered them. Cæcilius, espying this aduantage, sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troups, that stood embattailed, he vtterly brake them, and put them to their heeles; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this victory being brought to Rome, the whole State, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred saile, which they sent into Sicil, to giue end to that warre, that had now lasted foureteene yeeres. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolue to attempt Lilybæum, the onely place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicil; and all (indeede) saue Drepanum, that was neere adioyning. They set down before it, and possesse themselues of all the places of aduantage neere vnto it, especially of such as command the hauen, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fixe towres of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie,

fixe towres of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the citie, as the defendants begin to despaire. Yet Himilco, Commander of the Place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giueth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers, among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is reuealed by an Achæan, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saued Agrigentum. Himilco vseth the helpe of Alexon, to assure the hired Souldiers, and imployeth Hannibal to appease the troups of the Gaules, which did wauer, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vnable to performe what they had vndertaken, are faine to liue in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply often thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, hauing Hannibal the sonne of Amilcar, for their Conductor: who, in despight of all resistance, entred the Port and Citie, to the incredible ioy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolue to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the vttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to vnderstand the state of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian vndertakes the seruice; and hauing receiued his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Æguſa, a little Iland neere Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and hauing a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channel, and recouered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the couert of the darke night, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he set saile, and shipped his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quicke of steerage, and himselfe expert in all parts of the channell) recouered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in despight of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being incompassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauen, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to vndertake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkeable, and much wondred at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a-farre-off, the aduenture which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and iudicious man of warre will not feare to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of winde: no though fortie peeces of great Artillerie open their mouthes against him, and threaten to teare him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke and Sweden were at War; our East land fleet, bound for Leif-land, as forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the subiects of his enemies, & he threatned to sinke their ships if they came through the streights of Elsenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Maiesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the aduenture; and sustaining some Vollies of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the prouision he could, to stop them, or sinke them, at their returne. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not onely passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elsenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound receiued. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Parma besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise then by famine, laid his Cannon on the bancke of the Riuer, so well to purpose and so euen with the face of the water, that hee thought it impossible for the least boate to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blowne vp by any winde of glorie, but contenting to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheese, euen the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreame deare in Antwerp, passed in boats of ten or twelue Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despight of it, when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of floud fauoured them; as also with a contrarie winde, and an ebbing water, they turned backe againe: so as hee was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado ouerthwart the Riuer, to his maruailous trouble and charge.

The Fort Saint Philip terrified not vs in the yeere 1596. when we entred the Port of Caliz; neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat vs from our anchoring by it; though it plaied vpon vs with foure Demi-cannons within point blanque, from sixe in the morning till twelue at noone. The siege of Ostend, and of many other places, may be giuen for proofe, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so ser, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the ships are driuen to turne vpon a bow-line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great vse, and feare full: otherwise not.

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian: He arriues in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybæum. Others also, after this take vpon them to doe the like, and performe it with the same successe. The Romans therefore labour to choake the channell; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sinke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it againe in part: but they grounded so many of those great bellied boates in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heape, like a ragged Iland, in the passage. Hereby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ranne her selfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the braue Rhodian, thinking to enter, as hee had done before: but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gaue him chace, and gathered vpon him; hee findes what she is, both by her forme and by her swiftnesse: and being not able to runne from her, resolued to fight with her. But she is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybæum, after this, is greatly distressed; the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despaire there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans woodden Towers, by which they ouer-topt the wals of Lilybæum, were ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier vndertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performes it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bellowes of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistlesse, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brasen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despaire and wearinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolue, by a long siege, to starue the defendants.

Vpon relation of what had past, a supply of tenne thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, vnder M. Claudius, the Consull. Hee arriues at Messana, and marcheth ouer land to Lilybæum: where hauing re-inforced the Armie, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprise of Drepanum, a Citie on the other side of the Bay of Lilybæum. This seruice the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consull embarques his troupes, and arriues on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Gouernour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new supply arriued at Lilybæum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but hauing [redacted] couered his spirits, he perswades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroade, than to be inclosed. Herewithall he promiseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserue them; offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Hauing sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consull, deceiued of his expectation, cals backe the formost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and followes his aduantage, and forceth the Consull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himselfe, hauing the land on his backe: hoping thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-roome, so streightned, as hee could not turne himselfe any way from his enemies, nor range himselfe in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, hee thrust out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, beſides his owne, and ſo fled away: all the reſt of his fleet, to the number of ninetie and foure ſhips, were taken or ſunke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this ſeruice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiſcretion and flight, as much diſgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithſtanding this great loſſe, arme threeſcore Gallies, with which they ſend away L. Iunius, their Conſull, to take charge of their buſineſſe in Sicil. Iunius arriues at Meſſana, where he meetes with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, thoſe excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybæum. One hundred and twentie Gallies hee had; and beſides theſe, hee had gotten together almoſt eight hundred ſhips of burthen, which were laden with all neceſſary prouiſions for the Armie. With this great fleet he arriues at Syracuſe, where he ſtaies a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for ſome, that were too ſlow of ſaile, to keepe company with him along from Meſſana. In the meane time, he diſpatcheth away towards Lilybæum, his Quæſtors or Treaſurers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victuallers, with ſome Gallies for their conuoy.

Adherbal was not careleſſe, after his late victory: but ſtudied how to vſe it to the beſt aduantage. The ſhips and priſoners that he had taken, he ſent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies he deliuered thirtie to Carthalo, who had threeſcore and tenne more vnder his owne charge; and ſent him to try, what good might be done againſt the Roman fleet, in the Hauen of Lilybæum. According to this direction, Carthalo ſuddenly enters the mouth of that Hauen, where he finds the Romans, more attentiue to the keeping in of the beſieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their owne againſt another fleet. So hee chargeth them, boords and takes ſome, and fires the reſt. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and haſtens to the reſcue. But Himilco, Gouernour of the Towne, is not behinde hand; who ſallies out at the ſame time, and putting the Romans to great diſtreſſe, giues Carthalo good leiſure to goe through with his enterpriſe.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coaſt of Sicil, deuiſing how to worke miſchiefe to the enemy; wherein Fortune preſented him with a faire occaſion, which he wiſely managed. He was aduertiſed by his Scouts, that they had deſcried, neere at hand, a great fleet, conſiſting of all manner of Veſſels. Theſe were the victuallers, which the Conſull Iunius, more haſtily than prouidently, had ſent before him towards Lilybæum. Carthalo was glad to heare of their comming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reaſon of their late victories. Accompting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approching, to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make ſtrong oppoſition, he haſtens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to ſeeke ſhelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder couert of a poore Towne, belonging to their partie; that could helpe to ſaue them onely from the preſent danger, by lending them engines and other aide, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that aſſailed them. Carthalo therefore, hauing taken a few of them, lay waiting for the reſt, that could not long ride vnder thoſe rocks, but would be forced by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to ſaue their men, how they could, by taking land, with the loſſe of all their ſhipping. Whileſt he was buſied in this care; the Conſull Iunius drew neere, and was diſcouered. Againſt him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether vnprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Conſul had neither means to flie, nor abilitie to fight. Therefore he likewiſe ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger ſo great, as that of the enemy. The Carthaginian, ſeeing this, betakes himſelfe to a Station betweene the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to ſee which of them would firſt ſtir, with a reſolution to aſſault that, which ſhould firſt dare to put it ſelfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coaſt of Sicil, betweene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybæum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde ſtormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempeſt, and their ſignes, finding (belike) ſome ſwelling billow (for ſo we doe in the Weſt of England, before a Southerly ſtorme) haſted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to couer themſelues from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Nauigate, and neuer found any foule weather in the entrailes of their beaſts, their Soothſayers being all land-prophets, were ſuddenly ouer-taken with a boiſterous South winde, and all their Gallies forced againſt the rocks and vtterly wracke.

This calamity ſo diſcouraged the Romans, that they reſolued againe to forſake the Seas, and truſt onely to the ſeruice of their Legions vpon firme ground. But ſuch a reſolution cannot long hold. Either they muſt be ſtrong at Sea, or elſe they muſt not make warre in an Iland, againſt thoſe that haue a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excuſed, in regard of the many great calamities which they had ſuffered, through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbeare to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We ſeldome or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured ſo many miſaduentures and miſeries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian diſcoueries. Yet perſiſting in their enterpriſes, with an inuincible conſtancie, they haue annexed to their Kingdome ſo many goodly Prouinces, as buried the remembrance of all dangers paſt. Tempeſts and ſhipwracks, famine, ouerthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, peſtilence, and all manner of diſeaſes, both old and new, together with extreme pouertie, and want of all things needefull, haue beene the enemies, wherewith euery one of their moſt noble Diſcouerers, at one time or other, hath encountred. Many yeeres haue paſſed ouer ſome of their heads, in the ſearch of not ſo many leagues: yea more then one or two, haue ſpent their labour, their wealth, and their liues, in ſearch of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their firſt ſetting forth. All which notwithſtanding, the third, fourth, and fift vndertakers, haue not beene diſheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with thoſe Treaſuries, and Paradiſes, which they enioy; and well they deſerue to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The Citie of Eryx is ſurprized by the Romans, and recouered by Amilcar, who ſtoutly holds warre with them fiue yeeres. The Romans hauing emptied their common treaſurie, build a new fleet, at the charges of priuate men. The great victorie at Sea of Luctatius the Conſull; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to craue peace. The conditions of the peace betweene Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were carefull, to ſupply with all induſtry, by land, the want of ſtrength at Sea. Therefore they continue the ſiege of Lilybæum, and ſeeke to make ſure to themſelues all places, whither the enemie ſhips could not bring reliefe. The Conſull Iunius, to cure the wound of diſhonour, which he had receiued, bethought him what enterpriſes to vndertake. In the end he reſolued to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the faireſt and richeſt of all the Iland; and of theſe, by cunning or treaſon, he got poſſeſſion. Eryx was commodiouſly ſeated betweene Drepanum and Panormus; ſo that it ſeemed a fit place for a Garriſon, that ſhould reſtraine the Carthaginians from making roads into the Countrey. Wherefore Iunius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the firſt entrance of the paſſage from the bottome, (both which places were very defencible) with a good ſtrength of men. But ſhortly after, in the eighteenth yeere of this warre, the Carthaginians ſent forth Amilcar, ſurnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and armie, who ſailing to the coaſts of Italie, did throughly repay the ſpoyles which the Romans made in Africa. For hee firſt of all waſted and deſtroyed the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred hee into Sicil; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that ſerued fitly to infeſt the Romans, he occupied a peece of ground of great aduantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as thoſe that kept about Eryx, putting himſelfe betweene both Armies with admirable reſolution.

The place that Amilcar had ſeized vpon, was not onely very ſtrong by ſituation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him oportunitie, to ſcoure all the coaſt of Italie with his fleet, waſting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Iſle of Sicil he held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere vnto Panormus, where in three yeeres abode he did many notable acts, though not of much conſequence, for that the enemy could neuer be drawne to hazard the maine chance. Hauing wearied himſelfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, hee vndertooke a ſtrange peece of worke at Eryx. The Roman Garriſons, placed there by Iunius, on the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuertheleſſe Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-ſide, by which he conueighed his men into the Citie of Eryx, that was about the middeſt of the aſcent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to paſſe, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountaine, were ſtreightly held (as it were) beſieged. And no leſſe was Amilcar himſelfe reſtrained, by both of theſe Garriſons, and ſuch as came to relieue them. There he found them paſtime about two yeeres more; hoping ſtill to wearie out thoſe that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrary did their beſt, to thruſt him out of thoſe quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent vnto the proſequuting of this buſineſſe at Eryx. Wherein it ſeemes true (as Hannibal, in Liuie, Liu. Dec. 3. l. 6 ſpake vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer ſtood in better termes, ſince the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had vtterly forſaken the Seas, partly by reaſon of their great loſſes; partly vpon confidence of their land-forces, which they held reſiſtleſſe; Amilcar, with a ſmall Armie, had ſo well acquited himſelfe, to the honour of his Countrie, that by the triall of fiue yeares warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was iudged equall, if not ſuperiour to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had beene deuiſed and gone, for the diſlodging of this obſtinate Warriour: no way ſeemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the maſtrie of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lacke of ſupply, ſhould not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common treaſurie was exhauſted: and the coſt was not little, that was requiſite vnto ſuch an enterpriſe. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon priuate purſes. Diuers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought ſo well, that they, whoſe abilitie would not ſerue to doe the like, ioyned with ſome others, and laying their monie together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repaied, when the war was finiſhed. By this voluntary contribution, they made and furniſhed two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent ſwift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilybæum, as was ſhewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Luctatius Catulus; who paſt with the ſame into Sicil, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum, indeuouring by all meanes to haue forced the Citie. But being aduertiſed that the Carthaginian fleete was at hand, and being mindefull of the late loſſes which his Predeceſſours had receiued; he was carefull to put himſelfe in order, againſt their arriuall.

Hanno was Admirall of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wiſe in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the art of ſeeming reuerend. How his reputation was firſt bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, or things vndertaken by men more worthy than himſelfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient ſort, whoſe cold temper is auerſe from new enterpriſes, and therewithall an opinion of great fore-ſight, confirmed by euery loſſe receiued. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the moſt grieuous oppreſſors of their ſubiect Prouinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall ſuch hatred, as turned it all to their great loſſe. He had ere this beene imployed againſt the Numidians, and wilde Africans, that were more like to Rouers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of thoſe fugitiue Nations, he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great diſhonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which loſt not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counſaile, when, hauing ſhewed himſelfe an vnworthy Captaine, hee betooke himſelfe to the long Robe. Yet is hee much commended in Roman Hiſtories, as a temperate man, and one that ſtudied how to preſerue the League betweene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee deſerued of his owne Countrie, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall hee was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his preſent voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miſerable neceſſitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which he thence-forth commended.

Hanno had very well furniſhed his Nauie, with all needefull prouiſions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the beſt of his qualities) but he had had neither beene carefull in trayning his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with ſtout fellowes. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the vnexpert Romans giue way: forgetting, that rather the reſiſtleſſe force of tempeſts, than any other ſtrength of oppoſition, had made them to forſake the Seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceiued aright, or elſe was ſent forth well inſtructed. It was his purpoſe, firſt of all to ſaile to Eryx, and there to diſcharge his ſhips of their lading: and hauing thus lightned himſelfe, he meant to take aboord ſome part of the Land-armie, together with Amilcar himſelfe, by whoſe helpe he doubted not, but that he ſhould be able to make his enemy repent of his new aduenture to Sea. This was a good courſe, if it could haue beene performed, But Catulus vſed all poſſible diligence, to preuent the execution of this deſigne: not becauſe he was informed of the enemies purpoſe, but that he knew it to be the beſt for them, & for that he feared no danger ſo greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was deſcried; yet he rather choſe to fight with the enemy, that had the winde of him, than to ſuffer this conuoy to paſſe along to Eryx, vpon vnlikely hope of better oportunitie in the future. All that Hanno ſhould haue done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exerciſed his men in Rowing; he had lightned his Gallies of all vnneceſſarie burthens; and he had taken aboord the choice men of the Roman Land-ſouldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the firſt encounter, were vtterly broken and defeated; hauing fiftie of their Gallies ſtemmed and ſunke, and ſeauentie taken, wherein were few leſſe than ten thouſand men, that were all made priſoners: the reſt, by a ſudden change of winde, eſcaping to the Ile of Hieroneſus.

The ſtate of Carthage, vtterly diſcouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to reſolue. Meanes to repaire their fleete in any time there were none left; their beſt men of warre by Sea were conſumed; and Amilcar, vpon whoſe valour and iudgement the honour and ſafetie of the Common-weale reſted, was now ſurrounded by his enemies in Sicil, where hee could not be relieued. In this extremitie, they make diſpatch vnto Amilcar himſelfe, and authorize him to take what courſe ſhould ſeeme beſt vnto his excellent wiſedome; leauing all concluſions to his election and ſole counſaile.

Amilcar, whom no aduerſitie, accompanied with the leaſt hope or poſſibilitie of recouery, had euer vanquiſhed, looking ouer euery promiſe, true or falſe, that the preſent time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future hee was not able) reſolued to make triall, whether his neceſſitie might be compounded vpon any reaſonable tearmes. Hee therefore ſent to Lutatius the Conſull an Ouerture of peace: who conſidering it well, gathered ſo many arguments from the preſent pouertie of the Roman State, waſted beyond expectation in the former warre, that hee willingly harkened vnto it. So, in concluſion, an accord was made, but with prouiſion, That it ſhould hold none otherwiſe, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: Firſt, that the Carthaginians ſhould clearely abandon the Iſle of Sicil. Secondly, that they ſhould neuer vnder-take vpon Hieron King of Syracuſe, nor inuade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they ſhould ſet at liberty, and ſend backe into Italie, all the Romans, whom they hold priſoners, without ranſome. Laſtly, that they ſhould pay vnto the Romans two thouſand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteene hundred and twenty thouſand crownes: the ſame to be deliuered within twenty yeeres next following.

Theſe Articles were ſent to Rome, where they were not throughly approued: but ten Commiſſioners were ſent into Sicil, to make perfect the agreement. Theſe Commiſſioners added a thouſand talents to the former ſum; and required a ſhorter time of paiment. Further alſo, they tooke order, that the Carthaginians ſhould not onely depart out of Sicil it ſelfe, but ſhould alſo with-draw their Companies out of all the other Ilands betweene it and Italie, renouncing their whole intereſt therein.

Such was the end of the firſt Punick Warre, that had laſted about twentie foure yeares without intermiſſion; in which time the Romans had loſt, by fight or ſhipwracke, about ſeuen hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians, about fiue hundred: the greatneſſe of which loſſes, doth ſerue to prooue the greatneſſe both of theſe two Cities, and of the Warre it selfe; wherein I hold good the iudgement of Polybius, That the Romans, in generall, did shew themselues the brauer Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthie Captaine.

CHAP. II.

Of diuers actions passing betweene the first and second Punick Warres.

§. I.

Of the cruell Warre begunne betweene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercenaries.

THE Romanes, hauing partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicil, and all the little Ilands thereunto adiacent, gaue them rather meanes and leisure to helpe themselues in a following Warre, then cause to hold themselues contented with the present peace. It is an ancient and true rule, Quòd leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That lawes are giuen by the Conquerors, and receiued of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answere that was made vnto them, by one of the Priuernates; or else had forgotten to follow it, in this waighty businesse. For when one of Priuernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, What peace the Romanes might hope for, or assure themselues of, if they quitted their present aduantage ouer them; he answered in these words, Si bonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; If the peace be good and faithfull that you giue vs, it will be perpetuall; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this answere, the Senate, at that time, gaue such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem audiuit; an credi posset, vllum populum, aut hominem denig. in ea conditione, cuius tum pœniteat, diutius quàm necesse sit mansurum? That it was the speech of a manly, and a free man; for who could beleeue, that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an ouer-burdened estate, than meere necessitie did enforce? Now if the Romans themselues could make this iudgement, of those Nations, who had little else, besides their manly resolution, to defend their libertie; surely, they grosly flattered themselues, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferiour vnto themselues, would sit downe any longer by the losse and dishonour receiued, than vntill they could recouer their legs, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take reuenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not onely priuate men, but Kings and publique States, haue more preuailed, than by any proper prowesse or vertue, with-held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearefully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselues.

For after that the first Punick Warre was ended; Amilcar, leauing Eryx, went to Lilibæum, from whence most conueniently the Armie might be transported into Africk: the care of which businesse he committed vnto Gesco, to whom, as to a man of approued sufficiencie, he deliuered ouer his charge. Gesco had an especiall consideration of the great summes, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercenaries; and, withall, of the great disabilitie to make paiment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them ouer (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that so the first might haue their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Companies arriued. Heerein he dealt prouidently. For it had not beene hard to perswade any small number, lodged within so great a Citie as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptinesse of the common Treasurie did require: so that the first might haue beene friendly discharged, and a good president left vnto the second and third, whilest their dis-iunction had made them them vnable to recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would bee contented to gratifie the Publique State, by remitting a great part of their owne due; and hoped by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the first and second commers; telling them, that they would make an euen reckoning with all together. Thus euery day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remoue them all to some other place where they might bee lesse troublesome. This must bee done by some colourable words of perswasion: for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the comming of their fellowes, at Sicca: receiuing euery one a piece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dislodge; leauing behinde them their wiues, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came backe for their pay. But the Carthaginians haue no fancie to their returning into the Towne; and therefore compell them to trusse vp their fardells, that they might haue none occasion left to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they remooued, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arriuall, and their owne pay. Businesse they had none to do, and therefore might easily be drawn to mutinie: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their dailie talke was, how rich they should be, when all their money came in; how much would fall to euery single share; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians; and hee was thought a man of worth, that could finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, euen beyond their due. No part of their long seruice was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, as so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time passeth away; vntill the whole Armie being arriued, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutlie the common cause. So thinke they all; and assemble themselues to heare what good newes this messenger had brought: with a full resolution to help his memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them; all which were to be considered in their Donatiue. Hanno begins a very formall Oration; wherein he bewailes the pouerty of Carthage; tells them, how great a summe of mony is to bee paid vnto the Romans; reckons vp the excessiue charges, whereat the common wealth had beene in the late warre; and finally desires them to hold themselues contented with part of their pay, and out of the loue which they bare vnto the Citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of sundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceiued the whole tenor of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad men, so that nothing would serue to appease them.

Hanno would faine haue asswaged their furie, but he knew not how: for hee lesse vnderstood their dissonant lowd noyses, than they did his Oration. An Army collected out of so many countries, that haue no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easilie stirred vp to mutinie, nor easilie pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can do, is to vse the helpe of Interpreters and messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning; some, for want of skill; others of set purpose; and such as deliuer his errands in the worst sense, are best beleeued. Finallie, they thinke themselues much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolue to demand their owne in peremptorie termes, at a neerer distance. In this mood they leaue Sicca, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a very little of Carthage, and there they incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their owne errour. It is a good rule,

Curandum

Curandum inprimis, ne magna iniuria fiat
Fortibus & miseris.

Haue ſpeciall care, that valiant pouertie
Be not oppreſt with too great iniurie.

But this proud citie, hauing neglected the rule, hath alſo beene careleſſe in prouiding to ſecure her ſelfe againſt the inconuenience that might follow. Shee had ſuffered the whole multitude, whereunto ſhe was like to giue cauſe of diſcontent, to ioyne it ſelfe into one bodie, when the ſeuerall troupes might eaſily haue beene diſperſed: ſhe hath turned out of her gates the wiues, children, and goods of theſe poore men, which had ſhe retained in ſhew of kindneſſe, ſhe might haue vſed them as Hoſtages, for her own ſafety; and by imploying a miſerable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of Warre, ſhe hath weakened the reputation of her braueſt Captaines, that might beſt haue ſerued to free her from the threatning danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no deſire to bee vſed as an inſtrument in defrauding his owne Souldiers of their wages: eſpecially conſidering, that as he beſt could beare witneſſe of their merits, ſo was he not ignorant, that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had beene willing thereunto. Hereunto may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemie to Amilcar, had the boldneſſe to impoſe the blame of his owne wretched counſaile, vpon the liberall promiſes made by the Captaines. Amilcar therefore did wiſely, in ſuffering thoſe that maligned him, to haue the managing of their owne plot, and to deale the cards which themſelues had ſhuffled. This they continue to doe as fooliſhly, as they had at firſt begun. They furniſh a market at Tunis, for the ſouldiours; whom they ſuffer to buy what they liſt, and at what price they liſt: They ſend euer and anon ſome of their Senatours into the Campe; who promiſe to ſatiefie all demands, as farre forth as it ſhould be poſſible. And thus by ſhifting from one extreame to another, they make the Souldiours vnderſtand, into what feare the Citie was driuen; which cannot chuſe but adde much inſolencie to the paſſions alreadie ſtirred vp.

This ſudden change of weather, and the true cauſe of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon growes wiſe, and finding the ſeaſon fit, labors to make a great harueſt. Mony muſt be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue loſt their horſes, in publique ſeruice of the ſtate. The ſtate ſhall pay for them. They had liued ſome yeares, by making hard ſhift, without receiuing their allowance of victualls from Carthage. If they had liued, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ſhips did bring in prouiſion; or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it? But this would not ſerue. They ſaid that they had beene ſometimes driuen to buy; and that (ſince they could not remember; how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their prouiſion, during the whole time, and according to the deareſt price that wheat had borne, whileſt the Warre laſted. Such are now the demands of theſe Mutiners; who might eaſily haue beene ſatisfied with farre leſſe charges, and farre more honour, by receiuing their due at the firſt. But now they make none end of craning. For whileſt the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this Corn-monie; the Souldiers haue deuiſed many more tricks, wherby to extort a greater ſum of money, without all regard of ſhame. Since therefore no good end could bee found of theſe controuerſies which daily did multiply, it was thought conuenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, ſhould be choſen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condeſcended, and made choiſe of Geſco: partly out of good liking to him, who had ſhewed himſelfe at all times a friendly man to them, and carefull of their good, eſpecially when they were to be tranſported into Africke: partly out of a diſlike which they had conceiued of Amilcar; for that hee had not viſited them in all this buſie time. So Geſco comes among them, and, to pleaſe them the better, comes not without money: which might giue better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calls vnto him firſt of all, the Captaines, and then, the ſeuerall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had paſſed; adniſing them temperately concerning the preſent; and exhorting them to continue their loue vnto the State, which had long entertained them, and would needs alwaies be mindefull of their good ſeruices. After this hee began to put hand to his purſe: offering to giue them their whole pay in hand; and then after to conſider of other reckonings at a more conuenient time. This had beene well accepted, and might haue ſerued to bring all to a quiet paſſe; if two ſeditious ring leaders of the multitude had not ſtood againſt it.

There was in the Campe one Spendius, a ſturdie fellow, and audacious, but a ſlaue, that in the late war had fled from a Roman whom he ſerued, and therfore ſtood in feare, leſt he ſhould be deliuered backe to his Maſter; at whoſe hands he could expect no leſſe, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by raiſing ſuch troubles as might ſerue to with-draw men from care of priuate matters, and make his owne reſtitution impoſſible, were his Maſter neuer ſo importunate. With Spendius there aſſociated himſelfe one Matho; an hote-headed man, that had beene ſo forward in ſtirring vp the tumult, as he could not chooſe but feare, leſt his owne death ſhould be made an example, to deterre others from the like ſeditious behauiour. This Matho deales with his Countrimen the Africans; telling them, that they were in farre worſe condition, than either the Gaules, the Greekes, the Spaniards, or any forreyne mercinaries. For (ſaith he) theſe our companions haue no more to doe, than to receiue their wages, and ſo get them gone: but wee, that are to ſtay behinde in Africa, ſhall be called to another manner of accompt, when wee are left alone; ſo that wee ſhall haue cauſe to wiſh, that we had returned home beggers, rather then loaden with the monie, which (little though it be) ſhall break our backes. Yee are not ignorant, how tyrannically thoſe our haughty Maſters of Carthage doe reigne ouer vs. They thinke it reaſonable, that our liues and goods ſhould bee at their diſpoſition; which they haue at other times beene accuſtomed to take from vs, euen without apparent cauſe, as it were to declare their Souereigntie: what will they now doe, ſeeing that we haue demeaned our ſelues as free men, and been bold to ſet a good face on the matter, demanding our owne, as others haue done? Ye all doe know, that it were a very ſhame for vs, if hauing beene as forward in euery danger of warre, as any other men, wee ſhould now ſtand quaking like ſlaues, and not dare to open our mouthes, when others take libertie to require their due. This notwithſtanding yee may aſſure your ſelues, that we are like to be taught better manners, as ſoone as our fellows are gone: in regard of whom they are content to ſhadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let vs therefore be wiſe; and conſider, that they hate and feare vs. Their hatred will ſhew it ſelfe, when their feare is once paſt: vnleſſe wee now take our time, and, whileſt we are the ſtronger, enfeeble them ſo greatlie, that their hatred ſhall not be able to doe vs wrong. All their ſtrength conſiſteth in monie, wherwithall they haue hired others againſt vs, & vs againſt others. At the preſent they haue neither monie nor frends. The beſt Armie that euer ſerued them, whereof we are no ſmall part, lies at their gates, ready to helpe vs if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected: for were our ſwords once drawn, all Africk would riſe on our ſide. As for the Carthaginians, whither can they ſend for helpe? The caſe it ſelfe is plaine: but wee muſt quickely reſolue. Either we muſt preuent the diligence of Geſco, by incenſing theſe Gaules and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw bloud; or elſe it behoueth vs to pleaſe our good maſters, by ioyning with them againſt our fellowes, yea by offering to forgiue vnto them all our wages, if ſo (peraduenture) they may bee wonne to forgiue vs, or not ouer-cruellie to puniſh our faults committed. Hee is moſt worthilie a wretched ſlaue, that neither hath care to winne his Maſters loue, nor the courage to attempt his owne libertie.

By ſuch perſwaſions Matho winnes the African ſouldiers to his owne purpoſe. They are not now ſo greedie of monie, as of quarrell, which he that ſeeketh, will not miſſe to finde. When Geſco therefore offered to pay them their whole ſtipend preſently, but referred their other demands, for horſes and victuals to ſome other more conuenient time; they breake into great outrage, and ſay that they will haue all, euen all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie flocke together about Matho & Spendius; whoſe diligence is not wanting, to adde more fuell to the fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the onely men to whom the ſouldiers will hearken: if any other ſtand vp to make a ſpeech, a ſhowre of ſtones, flying about his eares, puts him to ſilence, that hee ſhall neuer afterwards ſpeake word more. Neither ſtay they to conſider what it is that any man would ſay; enough hath been ſaid alreadie by theſe good ſpokeſmen; ſo that no other word (though perhaps to the ſame purpoſe) can bee heard, ſaue onelie Throw, throw.

Now

Now the Rebellion begins to take forme. Matho and Spendus are choſen Captaines; who, followed by a deſperate crue of Ruffians, will ſuffer no man to make his owne peace, but purſue their owne ends, vnder faire pretence of the common cauſe. All which notwithſtanding, Geſco is not wanting to the good of his countrie, but aduentures himſelfe vpon their furie. One while he deales with the Captaines, and other principal men; taking them by the hand, and giuing gentle words: another while hee workes with the ſeuerall Nations; putting them all in hope of their own harts deſire, if any reaſon would content them. None of them are ſo ſullen as the Africans: indeed none of them had ſo good cauſe. They require him peremptorilie, to giue them their owne, and not to feede them with words. The truth is, that they are not ſo couetous as they ſeeme: but will be more glad of an ill anſwere, than of a good payment. This is more then Geſco knowes: he ſees not that Matho hath any more then bare words to beſtow vpon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconſiderate heat, he tells them, That they may doe well, if they ſtand in want of mony, to ſeeke it of their Captaine, Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? They ſtay no longer, but lay violent hands vpon the treaſure that he had brought; yea vpon him alſo, and all that are with him: as intending to take this in part of paiment, and, for the reſt, to take another courſe. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleaſed them to ſee their fellowes beginne to grow calme, by his faire language: wherefore they caſt into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can finde; that ſo the Armie may bee freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treaſon. After this followes open warre. Matho ſollicits all Africk; and his Embaſſadors are euery where well entertained. Neither is it needfull to vſe perſwaſion: the very fame of this rebellion ſufficeth to draw the whole countrie into it. Now muſt the Carthaginians be plagued for thoſe oppreſſions, with which they haue plagued others. It is true that aduerſitie hath neuer beene vntold of her errours: and as ſhe is euer aſſured to heare her owne, ſo commonly with her owne ſhee vndergoes thoſe of other men. The Africans finding the Carthaginians hang vnder the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impoſitions were mercileſſe; that they tooke from them the one halfe of their corne; that they doubled their tributes in all things elſe; and that they inflicted vpon their vaſſals the greateſt puniſhment for the leaſt offences. Theſe cruelties the Carthaginians themſelues haue forgotten: but the people, that haue ſuffered ſo much, retaine all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not onely ſuch as can beare Armes, are ready to doe ſeruice in this great Commotion; but the very women bring forth their Iewels, and other ornaments, offering all to ſale for the maintenance of ſo iuſt a quarrell. By this great forwardneſſe, and liberall contribution, Matho and Spendius are ſupplied with a ſtrong aide of threeſcore and tenne thouſand Africans: and are moreouer furniſhed with mony, not only to ſatisfie the preſent appetite of their men, but ſufficient to continue the warre begun, though it ſhould be of long endurance.

§. II.

Diuers obſeruations vpon this warre with the mercenaries.

†. I.

Of Tyrannie, and how Tyrants are faine to vſe the helpe of mercenaries.

HEere let vs reſt a while, as in a conuenient place: whence wee may take a proſpect of the ſubiect, ouer which we trauaile. Behold a tyrannicall City, perſecuted by her owne mercenaries with a deadly warre. It is a common thing, as being almoſt neceſſarie, that a tyrannie ſhould be vpheld by mercenarie forces: it is common that mercenaries ſhould be falſe: and it is common that all warre made againſt Tyrants, ſhould be exceeding full of hate and cruelty. Yet we ſeldome heare, that euer the ruine of a tyrannie is procured or ſought, by thoſe that were hired to maintain the power of it: and ſeldome or neuer do we reade of any warre that hath been proſecuted with ſuch inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyrannie, is A violent forme of gouernment, not reſpecting the good of the ſubiect, but onely the pleaſure of the Commander. I purpoſely forbeare to ſay, that it is the vniuſt rule of one ouer many: for very truely doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the

the Athenians, that their dominion ouer their ſubiects, was none other than a meere tyrannie; though it were ſo, that they themſelues were a great Citie, and a popular eſtate. Neither is it peraduenture greatly needfull, that I ſhould call this forme of commanding, violent: ſince it may well and eaſily be conceiued, that no man willingly performes obedience, to one regardleſſe of his life and welfare; vnleſſe himſelfe be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly poſſeſſed with ſome extreme paſſion of loue. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for ſome Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very ſlaues; and he that is moſt cruell to ſome, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne aduantage. Neuertheleſſe, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers diſcretion cannot extend it ſelfe, vnto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of ſeuerall men; it is commonly ſeene, that the taſte of ſweetneſſe, drawne out of oppreſſion, hath ſo good a relliſh, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not ſuffer it to bee reſtrained with any limits of reſpect. Why ſhould he ſeeke out bounds to preſcribe vnto his deſires, who cannot endure the face of one ſo honeſt, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten, by extorting from ſome few: by ſparing none, he ſhould haue riches in goodly aboundance. Hee hath taken a great deale from euery one: but euery one could haue ſpared more. He hath wrung all their purſes, & now he hath enough: but (as Couetouſneſſe is neuer ſatisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a ſtocke, though it were indeed a good yeerely Income. Therefore he deuiſeth new tricks of robberie, and is not better pleaſed with the gaines, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, and he knowes it well: but he thinkes by crueltie to change hatred into feare. So hee makes it his exerciſe, to torment and murder all, whom he ſuſpecteth: in which courſe, if he ſuſpect none vniuſtly, he may be ſaid to deale craftily; but if Innocency be not ſafe, how can all this make any Conſpiratour to ſtand in feare, ſince the Traitor is no worſe rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore hee can thinke vpon none other ſecuritie, than to diſ-arme all his Subiects; to fortifie himſelfe within ſome ſtrong place; and for defence of his Perſon and ſtate, to hire as many luſtie Souldiers as ſhall be thought ſufficient. Theſe muſt not be of his owne Countrie: for if not euery one, yet ſome one or other might chance to haue a feeling of the publique miſerie. This conſidered, he allures vnto him a deſperate rabble of ſtrangers, the moſt vnhoneſt that can be found; ſuch as haue neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be carefull to ſupport him, by whoſe onely fauor they are maintained. Now leſt any of theſe, either by deteſtation of his wickedneſſe, or (which in wicked men is moſt likely) by promiſe of greater reward, than he doth giue, ſhould be drawne to turne his ſword againſt the Tyrant himſelfe: they ſhall all be permitted to doe as he doth; to robbe, to rauiſh, to murder, and to ſatisfie their owne appetites, in moſt outragious manner; being thought ſo much the more aſſured to their Maſter, by how much the more he ſees them grow hatefull to all men elſe. Conſidering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I muſt be faine to ſay, that theſe are not dreames: though ſome Engliſhman perhaps that were vnacquainted with Hiſtorie, lighting vpon this leafe, might ſuppoſe this diſcourſe to be but little better. This is to ſhew, both how tyrannie growes to ſtand in neede of mercinarie Souldiers, and how thoſe Mercinaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmely aſſured vnto the Tyrant.

†. II.

That the tyrannie of a Citie ouer her Subiects is worſe, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie muſt likewiſe vſe mercinary Souldiers.

NOw concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppreſſeth her Subiects; it may appeare ſome waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in manie things it is more intolerable. A Citie is iealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearefull of her life: the leſſe need hath ſhe therfore, to ſecure her ſelfe by crueltie. A Citie is not luxurious in conſuming her treaſures; and therefore needs the leſſe, to plucke from her Subiects. If warre, or any other great occaſion, driue her to neceſſitie, of taking from her Subiects more than ordinarie ſummes of money: the ſame neceſſitie makes either the contribution eaſie, or the taking excuſable. Indeed, no wrongs are ſo grieuous & hatefull, as thoſe that are inſolent. Remember (ſaith Caligula the Emperor, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list: these words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Iuuenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame vpon her slaues; that whilest she was whipping them, shee painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and vsed all signes of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grieuances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subiects, are free from all sence of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extreamely hate her, although desire of liberty make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needfull, that shee should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintaine them in all villanie, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselues, may serue to proue, That a Citie is scarce able to deserue the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, That the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not so heauie, as the burdens imposed by a cruell Citie. Not without some apparance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other priuate passions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, wee shall haue need to vse the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lasciuious, when Cato was faine to rise and leaue the Theater, to the end, that the reuerend regard of his grauity, might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtisans, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By common practice, and generall approued custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the priuate vertue or vice of any one man; nor by metaphysicall abstraction of the vniuersall from the singular; or of the Corporation from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I haue said elsewhere) That it were better to liue vnder one pernicious Tyrant, then vnder many thousands. The reasons, prouing this, are too many to set downe: but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soeuer, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good aduice, yea, or some vnexpected accident may reforme him: all which failing, yet is there hope, that his successour may prooue better.

Many Tyrants haue beene changed into worthy Kings: and many haue ill vsed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditary to their posterity, hath growne into the most excellent forme of Gouernment, euen a lawfull Monarchy. But they that liue vnder a tyrannicall Citie, haue no such hope: their Mistresse is immortall, and will not slacken the reines, vntill they be pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receiue the bridle of a more mightier Chariotier. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindefull of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall vpon the same sore, out of which, others had already sucked their fill. A new Gouernor comes yearely among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home empty to their hiues, without a good lading of waxe and honey. These flie into all quarters, and are quickely acquainted with euery mans wealth, or whatsoeuer else, in all the Prouince, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his feares: becomming themselues, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to winne their friendship, were an endlesse labour (yet it must be vndergone) and such as euery one hath not meanes to goe about: but were this effected, what auaileth it? The loue of one Gouernour is purchased with gifts: the Successor of this man, he is more louing than could be wished, in respect of a faire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who seekes the ruine of all that haue beene inward with them. So the miseries of this tyranny are not simple; but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of ciuill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or Of Recouery, against extorting Magistrates: yet wee finde, that it serued not wholly to restraine their Prouinciall Gouernours; who presuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bolde in their Prouinces, to worke all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of iudgement. If the subiects of Rome groned vnder such oppressions; what must we thinke of those that were vassals vnto Carthage? The Romanes imposed no burthensome tributes; they loued not to heare, that their Empire was grieuous; they condemned manie noble Citizens, for hauing beene ill Gouernours. At Carthage all went quite contrarie: the rapines newly deuiſed by one Magiſtrate, ſerued as Preſidents to inſtruct another; euery man reſolued to doe the like, when it ſhould fall to his turne; and hee was held a notable Stateſman, whoſe robberies had been ſuch, as might affoord a good ſhare to the common treaſure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice, are not extant: the gouernment of Verres the Roman in Sicil, that is liuely ſet out by Tullie, may ſerue to informe vs, what was the demeanour of theſe Punick Rulers, who ſtood in feare of no ſuch condemnation, as Verres vnder-went. By proſecuting this diſcourſe, I might inferre a more generall Propoſition; That a Citie cannot gouerne her ſubiect Prouinces ſo mildely, as a King: but it is enough to haue ſhewed, That the tyrannie of a Citie is farre more intolerable, than that of any one moſt wicked man.

Sutable to the crueltie of ſuch Lords, is the hatred of their ſubiects: and againe, ſutable to the hatred of the ſubiects, is the iealouſie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durſt vſe the ſeruice of African ſouldiers; in Africk it ſelfe, they had rather be beholding to others, that were farther fetcht. For the ſame purpoſe did Hannibal, in the ſecond Punick Warre, ſhift his mercenaries out of their own Countries; Vt Afri in Hiſpaniâ, Hiſpani in Africâ, melior procùl ab domo futurus vtercq; miles, velut mutuis pignoribus obligati ſtipendia facerent; That the Africans might ſerue in Spaine, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to proue the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutuall pledges. It is diſputable, I confeſſe, whether theſe African, and Spaniſh hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were ſubiect vnto Carthage, and carried into the field, not onely by reward, but by dutie. Yet ſeeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meere deſire of gaine, that made them fight; I will not nicely ſtand vpon proprietie of a word, but hold them, as Polybius alſo doth, no better than Mercenaries.

†. III.

The dangers growing from the vſe of mercenarie Souldiers, and forraine Auxiliaries.

THe extreame danger, growing from the imploiment of ſuch Souldiers, is well obſerued by Machiauel: who ſheweth, that they are more terrible to thoſe whom they ſerue, than to thoſe againſt whom they ſerue. They are ſeditious, vnfaithfull, diſobedient, deuourers, and deſtroiers of all places and countries, whereinto they are drawne; as being held by no other bond, than their owne commoditie. Yea, that which is moſt fearefull among ſuch hirelings, is, that they haue often, and in time of greateſt extremity, not onely refuſed to fight, in their defence, who haue entertained them, but reuolted vnto the contrarie part; to the vtter ruine of thoſe Princes and States, that haue truſted them. Theſe Mercenaries (ſaith Machiauel) which troubled all Italie, when Charles the eight of France did paſſe the Alpes, were the cauſe that the ſaid French King wonne the Realme of Naples, with ſuch eaſe without a ſword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queene Ioane of Naples, abandoned her ſeruice on the ſudden; and forced her to put her ſelfe into the hands of the King of Arragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the firſt of that race Duke of Millan, who being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his ſlaues; euen with the very ſame Armie which themſelues had leuied for their owne defence. But Lodouick Sforza, the ſonne of this Francis, by the iuſt iudgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto poſteritie, in looſing his whole Eſtate by the treacherie of ſuch faithleſſe Mercenaries, as his owne Father had beene. For, hauing waged an Armie of Switzers, and committed his Dutchie, together with his perſon, into their hands; hee was by them deliuered vp vnto his enemie the French King, by whom hee was incloſed in the Caſtle of Loches vnto his dying day.

The like inconuenience is found, in vſing the helpe of forreigne Auxiliaries. Wee ſee, that when the Emperour of Conſtantinople had hired ten thouſand Turkes againſt his neighbour Princes; hee could neuer, either by perſwaſion or force, ſet them againe ouer the Sea vpon Aſia ſide: which gaue beginning to the Chriſtian ſeruitude, that ſoone after followed.

followed. Alexander, the ſonne of Caſſander, ſought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, ſlue the ſame Alexander, who had inuited him, and made himſelfe King of Macedon. Syracon the Turke was called into Ægypt by Sanar the Soldan, againſt his Oppoſite: but this Turke did ſettle himſelfe ſo ſurely in Ægypt, that Saladine his Succeſſor became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, ſoone after. What need we looke about for examples of this kinde? Euery Kingdome, in effect, can furniſh vs. The Britaines drew the Saxons into this our Countrie; and Mac Murrough drew the Engliſh into Ireland: but the one and the other ſoone became Lords of thoſe two Kingdomes.

Againſt all this may bee alleadged, the good ſucceſſe of the vnited Prouinces of the Netherlands, vſing none other than ſuch kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeed theſe Low Countries haue many goodly and ſtrong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, induſtrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are ſtout Sea-men, and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they haue ſeldome been able to ſtand againſt the Spaniard. Neceſſity therefore compelled them to ſeeke helpe abroad: and the like neceſſitie made them forbeare to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with monie raiſed by their Trade, they maintained the Warre: and therefore could ill ſpare vnto the Pike and Musket, thoſe hands, that were of more vſe in helping to fill the common purſe. Yet what of this? they ſped well. Surely they ſped as ill as might be, whileſt they had none other than mercenarie Souldiers. Many fruitleſſe attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witneſſe it: and that braue Commander, Count Lodowicke of Naſſau, felt to his griefe, in his retrait from Groeningham; when in the very inſtant, that required their ſeruice in fight, his mercenaries cried out aloud for monie, and ſo ranne away. This was not the onely time, when the hired ſouldiers of the States, haue either ſought to hide their cowardize vnder a ſhew of greedineſſe; or at leaſt, by meere couetouſneſſe, haue ruined in one houre the labour of many moneths. I will not ſtand to prooue this by many examples: for they themſelues will not denie it. Neither would I touch the honor of Monſieur the Duke of Aniou, brother to the French King; ſaue that it is follie to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraine Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that ſuch Aiders make themſelues Lords ouer thoſe, to whom they lend their ſuccour: but where ſhall we meet with ſuch another as this Monſieur, who, for his protection promiſed, being rewarded with the Lordſhip of the Countrie, made it his firſt worke, to thruſt by violence a galling yoke vpon the peoples necke? Well, he liued to repent it, with griefe enough. Euen whileſt hee was counterfeiting vnto thoſe about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginarie ſorrow for the poore burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeuing the Towne to bee ſurpriſed and wonne; the death of the Count S. Aignan, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, diſcharged againſt his owne troupes, informed him better what had hapned; ſhewing, that they were his owne French, who ſtood in need of pitty. Then was his feigned paſſion changed, into a very bitter anguiſh of minde; wherein, ſmiting his breſt, and wringing his hands, hee exclaimed, Helas, mon Dieu, que veulx tu faire de moy? Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not ſerue to proue, that there is little danger in vſing mercenarie ſouldiers, or the helpe of forraine Auxiliaries. This notwithſtanding, they were obedient vnto neceſſitie, and ſought helpe of the Engliſh, Scottiſh and French: wherein they did wiſely, and proſpered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the ſame danger; when the Queen of England refuſed to accept the Soueraignty of their Country, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemie, purſued him with continuall warre; when the heire of England reigned in Scotland, a King too iuſt & wiſe (though not ingaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miſeries, or to help thoſe that had attempted the conqueſt of his own inheritance; then might the Netherlanders very ſafely repoſe confidence, in the forces of theſe their Neighbour-Countries. The ſouldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendations) not onely regardfull of the pay that they ſhould receiue, but well affected vnto the cauſe that they tooke in hand: or if any were cold in his deuotion, vnto the ſide whereon hee fought; yet was hee kept in order, by remembrance of his owne home, where the Engliſh would haue rewarded him with death, if that his faith had beene corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therfore trusted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessitie of the poorer sort was relieued, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helpes, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintaine against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbor-Countrie, of the same Religion, and to which they all are louingly affected; then may such a Countrie be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other businesse, in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so seldome, as it may well hold true in generall: That mercinarie, and forraigne auxiliarie forces, are no lesse dangerous, than the enemie, against whom they are entertained.

That the moderate gouernment of the Romanes gaue them assurance to vse the seruice of their owne subiects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindreth the vse and benefit of the like moderation.

HEere may it be demanded, whether also the Romanes were not compelled to vse seruice of other souldiours in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne Citizens? for if it were their manner to arme their owne subiects; how happened it, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers; how then could they auoid the inconueniences aboue rehearsed? The answere is; That their Armies were compounded vsually of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equall number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their subiects, as were either interessed in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times (though seldome they did imploy so many,) ten Romane Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had beene wanting: which serued to keepe in good order their subiects, that were alwaies fewer in the Army than themselues. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priuiledges and immunities, which they enioyed, made them assured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they liued almost at libertie, as being bound to little else, than to serue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how easie soeuer, seemes troublesome to the necke that hath beene accustomed to freedome. Therefore many people of Italie haue taken occasion of seuerall aduantages, to deliuer themselues from the Romane subiection. But still they haue been reclaimed by Warre; the Authors of rebellion haue sharply bin punished; and the people by degrees, haue obtained such libertie, as made them esteeme none otherwise of Rome, than as the common citie of all Italie. Yea, in processe of time it was granted vnto many Cities, and those farre off remooued, euen to Tarsus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne, That all the Burgesses should be free of Rome it selfe. This fauor was conferred absolutely vpon some; vpon some, with restraint of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Heereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release vnto their new subiects halfe of their tribute which they had beene wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a readie way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the reuiew of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innouation. Neither would it bee forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romanes good gouernment, That when some, for their well-deseruing, haue had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome; they haue refused it, and held themselues better contented with their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruell, that Petellia, a Citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to endure all extremitie of warre, than, vpon any condition, to forsake the Romans; euen when the Romans themselues had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subiects, and therefore willed them to looke to their owne good, as hauing beene faithfull to the vtmost. Such loue purchased these milde Gouernours, without impairing their Maiesty thereby. The summe of all is: They had, of their owne, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning thereunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other helpe of their owne subiects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperitie of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate vse of soueraigne power being so effectuall, in assuring the people

vnto their Lords, and consequentlie, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominions it may seeme strange, that the practice of tyrannie, whose effects are contrarie, hath been so common in all ages. The like, I know, may be said, of all Vice, and Irregularity whatsoeuer. For it is lesse difficult (whosoeuer thinke otherwise) and more safe, to keepe the way of Iustice and Honestie, than to turne aside from it; yet commonly our passions do leade vs into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Feare, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same vnruly appetite either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least-wise taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyrannie it is not so: for as much as we can hardlie descrie the passion, that is of force to insinuate it selfe into the whole tenour of a Gouernment. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires haue bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires haue seldome beene hereditarie, or long-lasting; but haue ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which meanes the gouernment hath beene reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That Tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannie? Why did the Athenians? Why haue many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safetie of the Weale publique? If they were ledde heereunto by any affection; what was that affection wherein so many thousand Citizens, diuided and subdiuided within themselues by factions, did all concurre, notwithstanding the much diuersitie of temper, and the vehemencie of priuate hatred among them? Doubtlesse, wee must bee faine to say, That Tyrannie is, by it selfe, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, wee know, is Animal politicum, apt euen by Nature, to command, or to obey; euery one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankinde, are common likewise vnto bruit beasts; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are giuen by nature, not onely to Man and Beast, but vnto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other Affections are likewise naturall, in conuenient measure, both vnto Mankinde, and to all creatures that haue sense, for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite: euen so is this desire of ruling or obaying, engrafted by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a ciuile forme of Iustice. All these in-bred qualities are good and vsefull. Neuertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttonie and Drunkennesse, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an vnproper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in lesse worthy creatures than beasts, and are yet not so common in beasts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than vnto bruit beasts, are held lesse vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grieuously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than of that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtfull vnto Mankinde, than that which issueth from the most noble roote, euen the depraued Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefes, of which hath beene an old question in dispute, whether be the worse; That all things, or That nothing should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and ouer-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary distemper, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Vnder the extremitie of either, no Countrie is able to subsist: yet the defectiue dulnesse, that permitteth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which, meere necessitie doth enforce the ordinarie Magistrate; whereas Tyrannie is more actiue, and pleaseth it selfe in the excesse, with a false colour of iustice. Examples of stupiditie, and vnaptnesse to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are euery where to be found: for this quality troubles not it selfe in seeking Empire; or if by some errour of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend or else a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also crueltie doth helpe to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknowne, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and seeketh not to bee knowne, but would be reputed honourable: for it is prosperum & felix scelus, a fortunate mischiefe, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour (saith Peter Charron) assigned vnto those, that know how to increase, or preserue humane nature: all honours, greatnesse, riches, dignities, empires, triumphs, trophees, are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. Cæsar and Alexander, haue vn-made and slaine, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the errour of Mans iudgement, in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true name of Tyrannie, when it growes to ripenesse, is none other, than Feritie: the same that Aristotle saith to bee worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeede all other vices, issuing from the Passions incident both to Man and Beast; no lesse than Periurie, Murder Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villanie, the faults of Gluttony and Drunkennesse, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Heereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pitiocamptes, that vsed their bodily force to the destruction of Mankinde, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius and Agathocles, whose mischieuous heads were assisted by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the vse of Rule, nor the difference between Freemen, and slaues.

The rule of the husband ouer the wife, and of parents ouer their children, is naturall, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwaies, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is, as the dominion of Reason ouer Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one free man can haue ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father ouer his whole countrie: which he that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knowes to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterlie rule, which God gaue vnto Adam, when hee said; Haue dominion ouer the fish of the Sea, and ouer the fowle of the aire; and euery liuing thing that moueth vpon the earth: which also he continueth vnto Noah, and his children, saying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, shall be vpon euery beast of the earth, and vpon euery fowle of the aire, vpon all that moueth vpon the earth, and vpon all the fishes of the Sea; into your hands are they deliuered. He who gaue this dominion vnto Man; did giue also an aptitude to vse it. The execution of this power hath since extended it selfe, ouer a verie great part of Mankinde. There are indeede no small numbers of men, whose disabilitie to gouerne themselues, proones them, according vnto Aristotles doctrine, to bee naturallie slaues.

Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppresse men with bondage: vnlesse the lawfulnesse thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man shall not bee punished for the death of a seruant, whom hee hath slaine by correction, if the seruant liue a day or two, because he is his monie; or else by the captiuity of the Midianitish girles, which were made bond-slaues, and the Sanctuarie had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtlesse the custome hath beene very ancient: for Noah laid this curse vpon Canaan, that he should be a seruant of seruants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men seruants and maid-seruants, which were none other then slaues. Christian Religion is said to haue abrogated this olde kinde of seruilitie: but surely, they are deceiued that thinke so. Saint Paul desired the libertie of Onesimus, whom hee had wonne vnto Christ: yet wrote for this vnto Philemon, by way of request, crauing it as a benefite, not vrging it as a dutie. Agreeable heereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giueth vnto seruants: Let euery man abide in the same calling wherein he was called: art thou called, being a seruant? care not for it, but if thou maist be made free, vse it rather. It is true, that Christian religion hath procured libertie vnto many; not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in feare, of being discouered by their slaues, vnto the persecuters of religion. Mahomet likewise by giuing libertie to his followers, drew many vnto his impietie: but whether he forbade it, as vnlawfull, vnto his sectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; saue that by the practice of the Turks and Moores, it seemes hee did not. In England we had many bond-seruants, vntill the time of our last ciuill warres: and I thinke that the Lawes concerning Villenage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaues were made free, which were of great vse and seruice, there are growne vp a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurses and other the like Trades; slaues in Nature, though not in Lawe.

Arist.Pol.l.1.c.3. Exod.21.v.21 Num.30.v.40 Gen.9.25. Gen.12.v.16. Epist.to Philē. vers.14. 1.Cor.c.7.v.20 & 21.

But whether this kinde of dominion bee lawfull, or not; Aristotle hath well prooued, that it is naturall. And certainely wee finde not such a latitude of difference in any creature, creature, as in the nature of man: wherein (to omit the infinite diſtance in eſtate of the elect and reprobate) the wiſeſt excell the moſt fooliſh, by far greater degree, than the moſt fooliſh of men doth ſurpaſſe the wiſeſt of beaſts. Therefore when Commiſeration hath giuen way to Reaſon: we ſhall finde that Nature is the ground euen of Maſterly power, and of ſeruile obedience, which is thereto correſpondent. But it may be truely ſaid, that ſome countries haue ſubſiſted long, without the vſe of any ſeruilitie: as alſo it is true, that ſome countries haue not the vſe of any tame cattell. Indeede the affections which vphold ciuill rule, are (though more noble) not ſo ſimply needefull, vnto the ſuſtentation either of our kinde, as are Luſt, and the like; or of euery one, as are hunger and thirſt; which notwithſtanding are the loweſt in degree. But where moſt vile, and ſeruile diſpoſitions, haue liberty to ſhew themſelues begging in the ſtreets; there may we more iuſtly wonder, how the dangerous toile of ſea-faring men can finde enough to vndertake them, than how the ſwarme of idle vagabonds ſhould increaſe, by acceſſe of thoſe, that are weary of their owne more painfull condition. This may ſuffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted euen by Nature, a deſire of abſolute dominion: whereunto the generall cuſtome of Nations doth ſubſcribe; together with the pleaſure which moſt men take in flatterers, that are the baſeſt of ſlaues.

This being ſo, we finde no cauſe to maruaile, how Tyranny hath beene ſo rife in all ages, and practiſed, not onely in the ſingle rule of ſome vicious Prince, but euer by conſent of whole Cities and Eſtates: ſince, other vices haue likewiſe gotten head, and borne a generall ſway, notwithſtanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that haue vſed well the inferiour Paſſions: how then can we expect, that the moſt noble affections ſhould not be diſordered? In the gouernment of wife and children, ſome are vtterly careleſſe, and corrupt all by their dull conniuencie: others, by maſterly rigour, hold their owne blood vnder condition of ſlauery. To be a good Gouernour is a rare commendation; and to preferre the Weale publike aboue all reſpects whatſoeuer, is the Vertue iuſtly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages affoord not many examples. Hector is named by Ariſtotle, as one of them; and deſeruedly, if this praiſe be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, vſed in defence of a mans owne countrie. But if we conſider, that a loue of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountaine of all goodneſſe: we ſhall finde, that no Morall vertue, how great ſoeuer, can, by it ſelfe, deſerue the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we muſt ſearch the Scriptures, for patterns hereof; ſuch as Dauid, Ioſaphat, and Ioſias were. Of Chriſtian Kings, if there were many ſuch, the world would ſoone be happy. It is not my purpoſe to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praiſe where it is due; or by preferring a leſſe excellent. But he that can finde a King religious, and zealous in Gods cauſe, without enforcement either of aduerſitie, or of ſome regard of ſtate; a procurer of the generall peace and quiet; who not onely vſeth his authoritie, but addes the trauell of his eloquence, in admoniſhing his Iudges to doe iuſtice; by the vigorous influence of whoſe Gouernment, ciuilitie is infuſed, euen into thoſe places, that haue beene the dens of ſauage Robbers and Cutthrotes; one that hath quite aboliſhed a ſlauiſh Brehon Law, by which an whole Nation of his ſubiects were held in bondage; and one, whoſe higher vertue and wiſedome doth make the praiſe not onely of Nobilitie and other ornaments, but of abſtinence from the bloud, the wiues, and the goods, of thoſe that are vnder his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto ſome good Princes, to appeare leſſe regardable: he, I ſay, that can finde ſuch a King, findeth an example, worthy to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Vnder ſuch a King, it is likely by Gods bleſſing, that a Land ſhall flouriſh, with increaſe of Trade, in countries before vnknowne; that Ciuilitie and Religion ſhall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happineſſe of his ſubiects, ſhall cauſe the Nations farre off remoued, to wiſh him their Souereigne. I neede not adde hereunto, that all the actions of ſuch a King, euen his bodily exerciſes, doe partake of vertue; ſince all things tending to the preſeruation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, ſeeketh how to imitate the vnſpeakeable goodneſſe, rather than the inacceſſible maieſtie, with both of which himſelfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe alſo belong to the furtherance of that common good, which he procureth. Leſt any man ſhould thinke me tranſported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bounds of reaſon; I adde hereunto, that such a King is neuertheleſſe a man, muſt die, and may erre: yet wiſedome and fame ſhall ſet him free, from errour, and from death, both with and without the helpe of time. One thing I may not omit, as a ſingular benefit (though there be many other beſides) redounding vnto this King, as the fruit of his goodneſſe. The people that liue vnder a pleaſant yoke, are not onely louing to their Soueraigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in muſter of men, then of ſtout fighters, if need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as ouer ſlaues, ſhall be attended in time of neceſsity, by ſlauiſh mindes, neither louing his perſon, nor regarding his or their owne honour. Cowards may be furious, and ſlaues outragious, for a time: but among ſpirits that haue once yeelded vnto ſlauery, vniuerſally it is found true, that Homer ſaith, God bereaueth a man of halfe his vertue, that day when hee caſteth him into bondage.

Hom. Odyſſ. l. 17

Of theſe things, I might perhaps more ſeaſonably haue ſpoken, in the generall diſcourſe of Gouernment: but where ſo liuely an example, of the calamity following a tyrannicall rule, and the vſe of Mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it ſelfe, as is this preſent buſineſſe of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectuall, than being barely deliuered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the warre against the Mercenaries was diuerſly managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable ſucceſſe. The bloudy counſailes of the Mercinaries; and their finall deſtruction.

BEing now to returne vnto thoſe Mercenaries, from whom I haue thus farre digreſſed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I ſhould call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they ſeeke their wages already due; ſo that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all beene ſubiects vnto Carthage, then might they iuſtly haue beene termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegeance to that State, which they endeuoured to ſubuert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and ſtill call them Mercenaries, as Polybius alſo doth.

These vſing the aduantage of their preſent ſtrength, beſieged Vtica*, and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being ſeated vpon the weſterne Hauen of Carthage, where it is diuided by a necke of land; Hippagreta ſtanding inwards vpon the great Lake; Vtica further out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunes abandoned, which lay filthy to hinder the Carthaginians, from paſſing vp into the countrie: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men, to follow the war in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may conceiue. But the buſineſſe it ſelfe awakes them haſtily. They are hardly preſt on all ſides; and therefore trauailed their braines to the vttermoſt, how to ſhake off theſe furious dogs from their ſhoulders, who ſometimes by night, ſometimes by day, came vnto the very wals of their Citie. In this exigent Hanno was made their Generall: who failed not in his accuſtomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together whatſoeuer was needfull, as well to relieue a Towne beſieged, as to batter and aſſaile any place defended againſt him. With theſe prouiſions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Vtica, ſo ſuddenly, that the enemies as men ſurpriſed, forſooke their Trenches, and retired themſelues vnto a riſing peece of woody ground, wherethey might be ſafe againſt the violence of his beaſts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whoſe cuſtome was, after any loſſe, to flie two or three whole dayes iourny off; preſently entred the Towne; to ſhew himſelfe, after this his victory. But theſe good fellowes, againſt whom he was to warre, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight againe, many times in one day, as neede required. Therefore as ſoone as they perceiued, that he knew not how to vſe a victory; they aſſailed their owne Campe, and with great ſlaughter, draue the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themſelues within Vtica; and got poſſeſſion of all the ſtore, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe of the Towne. This bad beginning Hanno followed with ſutable indiſcretion: looſing the benefit of many faire opportunities, and ſuffering the enemies to take poſſeſſion of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

Vtica* is ſeated in the great Bay, that enters towards Carthage, not farre within the Promontorie of Apollo. At this time it is called Porto Farina, or Biſerta; & by the Africans themſelues, Garel Melha. Niger ſaith, that the Towne it ſelfe is ruined, and the place, whereon it ſtood, now called Mazachares. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage, ſaith Silius. As it floriſhed before Carthage was ſet vp; ſo did it after Carthage was thrown down by the Romans, in the third Punick Warre. Famous it was by the death of Cato the yonger, who held it againſt Ceſar. Victor, that worthy Diuine, was Biſhop thereof in the time of Genſeric the Arrian; who liued all the time of that Tyrant, and hath written the ſtorie of his cruelties.

The Carthaginians, perceiuing this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their ſhete-anchor; ſending to the field their great Captaine, Amilcar, whom they furniſhed with ten thouſand foot of ſupply, and ſeuenty Elephants. Amilcar had worke enough to doe, before he ſhould be able to meete with the enemy vpon equall ground. For beſides other places of aduantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had ſuffered them to win the onely Bridge, by which the Riuer Macra, or Bagradas, was paſſable vnto theſe, that were to trauaile into the Continent. This Riuer had not many foords, nor thoſe eaſie for a ſingle man to get ouer: but vpon them all was kept ſuch guard, as gaue to Amilcar little hope of preuailing in ſeeking way by force. As for the Bridge it ſelfe, Matho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a Towne, wherein to lye commodiouſly, intentiue onely to the cuſtody thereof. But Amilcar had obſerued, that the very mouth of Bagradas vſed to be ſometimes cloyed with ſand and grauell, that was driuen in by certaine cuſtomarie windes, and could not be driuen out againe, by force of that ſlow Riuer, till the winde falling, or changing, ſuffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channell. Hereof he made vſe; and taking his opportunitie, paſſed the Riuer, contrary to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his owne Citizens.

There was no neede to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come ouer Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improuident grauity of Hanno, but with an able ſpirit, euen with their owne Maſter in the Art of Warre, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was ſoone changed into preſumption; when more than fifteene thouſand of their owne ſociety, were come from Vtica; and other ten thouſand from the gard of the Bridge. Their Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their owne iudgement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they reſolued to charge him on all ſides, and beate him downe, in deſpight of his worth and reputation. With this reſolution they attended vpon him, watching for ſome aduantage, and ſtill exhorting one another to play the men, and giue the onſet. Eſpecially they that followed him in the Rere, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promptneſſe was ſuch, as tooke from them their former circumſpection. Amilcar held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himſelfe on plaine grounds, that were fitteſt for the ſeruice of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Armie. Neither made he ſhew of any deſire to fight, but ſuffered the raſhneſſe of his enemies to increaſe, till it ſhould breake into ſome diſorder. At length perceiuing, that with more boldneſſe than good heede, they followed him ſo neere, as would be little for their good, if hee ſhould turne vpon them, he haſtened his march, euen to ſuch a pace, as made a ſhew little differing from plaine flight. The Mercinaries preſently fell vpon his skirts; beleeuing, that for feare of them he was ready to run away. But whileſt they confuſedly, as in ſudden opinion of victory, were driuing at the heeles of thoſe that had the Reare; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, ſo that amazed with the apprehenſion of inexpected danger, they fled without making any reſiſtance. In this ouerthrow, there were ſixe thouſand of the Mercenaries ſlaine, and about two thouſand taken, the reſt fled, ſome to the Campe at Vtica, others to the Towne at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them ſo faſt, that he wan the place eaſily; the enemies being thence alſo fled vnto Tunes, as not hauing recollected their ſpirits to make it good.

The fame of this victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in purſuing it, cauſed many Towns reuolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to returne to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himſelfe, in this dangerous time. Hee ſent about Numidia and Africke, for new ſupplies; admoniſhing the people, now or neuer to doe their beſt, for the recouery of their freedome; he perſwaded Spendius, and Autaritus that was Captaine of the Gaules, to wait vpon Amilcar, and alwayes to keepe the higher grounds, or at leaſt the foot of ſome hill, where they might be ſafe from the Elephants; and he himſelfe continued to preſſe the Towne of Hippagreta with an hard ſiege. It was neceſſary for Amilcar, in paſſing from place to place, as his buſineſſe required, to take ſuch wayes as there were: for all the Countrie lay not leuell. Therefore Spendius, who ſtill coaſted him, had once gotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, ſurrounded with hils, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their

Numidian

Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie, the fame of Amilcar his perſonall worth did greatly benefit his countrie. For Naraua ſus, a yong gentleman commanding ouer the Numidians, was glad of this occaſion ſeruing to get the acquaintance and loue of ſo braue a man, which he much deſired: and therefore came vnto Amilcar, ſignifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all ſeruice. Amilcar ioyfully entertained this friend; promiſed vnto him his owne daughter in marriage; and ſo wan from the enemies two thouſand horſe, that following Naraua ſus turned vnto the Carthaginians ſide. With this helpe he gaue battaile vnto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approue his owne valour, to his new friend. So the victory was great: for there were ſlaine tenne thouſand of Spendius his fellowes, and foure thouſand taken priſoners; but Spendius himſelfe, with Autarius the Gaule, eſcaped to doe more miſchiefe. Amilcar dealt very gently with his priſoners: pardoning all offences paſt, and diſmiſſing as many, as were vnwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they ſhould neuer more beare armes againſt the Carthaginians; threatning to take ſharpe reuenge vpon all, that ſhould breake this Couenant.

This humanitie was vehemently ſuſpected by Matho, Spendius, and Autarius, as tending to win from them, the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they reſolued to take ſuch order, that not a man among them ſhould dare, to truſt in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any ſafetie, whileſt Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertiſement, wherein was contained, that ſome of their company reſpectiue onely of their priuate benefit, and careleſſe of the generall good, had a purpoſe to betray them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; & that it was needfull, to looke well vnto Geſco, and his companions, whom theſe traitours had a purpoſe to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the Souldiours, exhorting them to fidelity; and ſhewing with many words, that the ſeeming humanity of Amilcar, toward ſome, was none other than a baite, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as alſo telling them, what a dangerous enemy Geſco would proue, if he might eſcape their hands. While he is yet in the midſt of his tale, were letters come, to the ſame purpoſe. Then ſteps forth Autarius, and ſpeakes his minde plainely: ſaying, that it were the beſt, yea the onely way, for the common ſafetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if ſome were deuiſing to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with thoſe that had a care of the warre; that it were better to make an end of Geſco his life, than to trouble themſelues with looking to his cuſtody; that by ſuch a courſe euery one ſhould be ingaged in the preſent Action, as hauing none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally, that ſuch as would ſpeake here-againſt, were worthy to be reputed Traitours. This Autarius was in great credit with the ſouldiers, and could ſpeake ſundry languages, in ſuch ſort, that he was vnderſtood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Geſco, and all the other priſoners, ſhould forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuertheleſſe there were ſome, that for loue of Geſco, ſought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith ſtoned to death, as a Document vnto others; and ſo the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they therewithall contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian priſoners which they tooke, ſhould be ſerued in like ſort: and that the ſubiects or friends of Carthage, ſhould loſe their hands, and ſo be ſent home: which rule they obſerued euer afterwards.

Of this cruelty I neede ſay no more, than that it was moſt execrable feritie. As for the counſaile of vſing it, it was like vnto the counſaile of Achitophel; All Iſrael ſhall heare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then ſhall the hands of all that are with thee, be ſtrong. Such are the fruits of deſperation. He that is paſt all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they be more innocent; and to auoide the puniſhment of leſſe offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the reuengefull ſpirits of thoſe that haue beene wronged, are breeders of this deſperation: to which may be added, ſome deficiencie of Lawes, in diſtinguiſhing the puniſhments of malefactors, according to the decree of their ſeuerall crimes. A coward thinkes all prouiſion too little for his owne ſecuritie. If Phocas be a coward (ſaid the Emperour Mauritius) then is he murderous. To be ſted faſt and ſure, in taking reuenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defenſatiue againſt new iniuries. But wrongfully: for it is oppoſite to the rule of Chriſtianitie; and ſuch a qualitie diſcouered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwiſe

wiſe would haue repented, and ſought to make amends, for the wrong done in paſſion. This was it, which wrought ſo much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to ſuſpect euen their gentleneſſe, as the introduction to extreame rigour. Like vnto the errours of Princes and Gouernours, are the errours of Lawes. Where one and the ſame puniſhment, is awarded vnto the leſſe offence, and vnto the greater, he that hath aduentured to robbe a man, is eaſily tempted to kill him, for his owne ſecuritie.

Againſt theſe inconueniences Mercy and Seueritie, vſed with due reſpect, are the beſt remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as theſe his owne ſouldiours were any way likely to be reclaimed, by gentle courſes; his humanity was ready to inuite them. But when they were tranſported with beaſtly outrage, beyond all regard of honeſty and ſhame; he rewarded their villanie with anſwerable vengeance; caſting them vnto wilde beaſts, to be deuoured.

Vntill this time Hanno, with the Armie vnder his command, had kept himſelfe apart from Amilcar, and done little, as may ſeeme, for that nothing is remembred of him, ſince his late loſſes. Neither was Amilcar ſorry to want his helpe, as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to ſuch extremity, as threatned vtter ruine to the one or the other ſide: then was Hanno ſent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he ioyned his forces. By this acceſſe of ſtrength Amilcar was not enabled, to doe more then in former times: rather he could now performe nothing; ſuch was the hatred betweene him and his vnworthy Colleague. The Towns of Vtica and Hippagreta, that had ſtood alwaies firme on the Carthaginian party, did now reuolt vnto the enemy, murdering all the ſouldiours that they had in Garriſon, and caſting their bodies forth, without ſuffering them to be buried. The prouiſions brought by ſea, for maintenance of the Armie, were loſt in foule weather: and Carthage it ſelfe ſtood in danger of being beſieged, about which Matho and Spendius conſulted, whileſt one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) binde the others hands.

It hath in all Ages beene vſed, as the ſafeſt courſe, to ſend forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of thoſe two mighty Cities, Athens and Rome, which other States and Princes haue often imitated; perſwading themſelues, that great Armies are not ſo well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will vſe the greater diligence. They haue alſo ioyned two chiefe Commanders in equall commiſſion, vpon this further conſideration; the better to reſtraine the ambition of any one, that ſhould be truſted with ſo great a ſtrength. For hereof all Common-weales haue beene iealous, hauing beene taught by their examples that haue made themſelues Tyrants ouer thoſe Cities and States that haue imployed them. In this point, the Venetians haue bin ſo circumſpect, as they haue for the moſt part, truſted ſtrangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they haue made. It is true, that the equall authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, ſerueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning vpon the Prince or State that hath giuen them truſt: but in mannaging the warre it ſelfe, it is commonly the cauſe of ill ſucceſſe. In warres made neere vnto Rome it ſelfe, when two good friends were Conſuls, or ſuch two at leaſt, as concurred in one deſire of Triumph; which honor (the greateſt of any that Rome could giue) was to be obtained by that one yeeres ſeruice; it is no maruaile, though each of the Conſuls did his beſt, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end then victory. Yet in all dangerous caſes, when the Conſuls proceeded otherwiſe then was deſired, one Dictator was appointed, whoſe power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeede the manner, to ſend forth both the Conſuls to one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Prouince; vnleſſe one buſineſſe ſeemed to require them both, and they alſo ſeemed fit to be ioyned in the adminiſtration. Now although it was ſo, that the Romans did many times preuaile with their ioynt Generals: yet was this neuer or ſeldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modeſty hath often beene ſuch, that the leſſe able Captaine, though of equall authority, hath willingly ſubmitted himſelfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithſtanding, they haue many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Armie, receiued great and moſt dangerous ouerthrowes; whereof in the ſecond Punick warre we ſhall finde examples. On the contrary ſide, in their warres moſt remote, that were alwayes mannaged by one, they ſeldome failed failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those ten Generals, which serued the Athenians at the Battaile of Marathon, it may truely be said, that had not their temper beene better, than the iudgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselues to the conduction of Miltiades: their affaires had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: the one being so ouer-warie, and the other so hastie, as all came to nought that they vndertooke; whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, hauing sole charge of all, did their Countrie and common-weale most remarkeable seruice. For it is hard to finde two great Captaines, of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of furie than of iudgement, and so the contrary, by which the best occasions are as often ouerslipt, as at other times many actions are vnseasonably vndertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condy was slaine after the Battaile of Iarnac, (which Prince, together with the Admirall Chastillan, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselues, they thought it rather an aduancement, than an hindrance to their affaires. For so much did the valour of the one, out-reach the aduisednesse of the other, as whatsoeuer the Admirall intended to win by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduentured to lose, by being ouer-confident in his owne courage.

But we neede no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present businesse: who, though they were still sicke of their ill-grounded loue to Hanno, and were vnwilling to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controuersies, vnto the Armie that serued vnder them. The iudgement of the Armie was, that Hanno should depart the Campe: which he did, and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar; and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Armie neere vnto the Citie, and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold, to hope and aduenture much; hauing in their Campe aboue fiftie thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Neuertheless, the Citie was too strong for them to win by assault: and the entrance of victualles they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracuse, though during the warres in Sicil hee assisted the Romans, and still continued in their Alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his owne; because if no other State gaue the Romans somewhat to trouble their disgestion, the Principalitie of Syracuse would soone be deuoured by them. The Romans also gaue them some slender assistance, and for the present refused good offers made vnto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to shew a kinde of noble disposition; which was indeede but counterfeit, as the sequele manifestly proued.

Whilest Matho and his followers were busily pressing the Citie, Amilcar was as diligent, in waiting at their backes, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselues more steightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issue into the field: when Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Captaine assisting the rebellion, take vpon them to finde Amilcar worke; leauing Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naraua∫ui, made Spendius fearefull to descend into the Plaines. Wherefore hee betooke himselfe to his former method of warre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the streightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it selfe, with little disaduantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. Hee drew the enemy to many skirmishes; in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus hee continued, prouoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giuing them the ouerthrow in plaine battaile: vntill at length hee got them into a streight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their iudgement was enough, to perceiue their owne disaduantage: and therefore they had the lesse stomacke to fight; fight; but awaiting for helpe from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreseeing, that necessity might teach them, to dare impossibilities, vsed the benefit of their present feare, and shut them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably for succour, that came not: and hauing spent all their victualls, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. This they suffred patiently, as knowing that they had not deserued any fauour from Carthage: and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be vnmindefull of them. But when they were driuen to such extremity, that they were faine to deuoure their owne companions, and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken, and they threatned their Captaines with what they deserued, vnlesse they would goe forth to Amilcar, and seeke such peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarxas, and Autaritus, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolued to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselues, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than perish by the hands of their owne Companions. Hereupon they send to craue parle, which is granted; and these three come forth to talke with Amilcar in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it seemes that they tooke the blame vpon themselues, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilcar told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he forthwith went to fetch, with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon so gentle articles, thought themselues betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the same astonishment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilcar both colour of iustice, in accomplishing reuenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being fortie thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the reuolted Cities of Africke. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naraua-ſus and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places ready to yeelde: Vtica, and Hippagreta, onely standing out, vpon feare of deserued vengeance; and Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of the enemy. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the wals; to terrifie those of his old companions, that were still in armes. With this rigor the siege began; as if speedy victory had beene assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the opposite side: too far asunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoued each, to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the wals beheld his owne destinie, in the misery of his companion, and knew not how to auoide it otherwise than by a cast at dice with fortune. So hee brake out vpon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay secure, as if all danger were past, vnder the command of Hannibal: and with so great and vnexpected furie he sallied, that after an exceeding slaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoner; on whom, and thirtie the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, hee presently reuenged the death of Spendius by the same torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had hee strength enough remaining, after this great losse, to continue the siege; but was faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the Riuer Bagradas, where hee incamped.

The terrour was no lesse within Carthage, vpon the fame of this losse; than had beene the ioy of the late great victory. All that could beare armes, were sent into the field, vnder Hanno; whom, it seemes, they thought the most able of their Captaines suruiuing the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the imployment of one sole Generall, neere vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to haue trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hastie exigent, to deuise about repealing it. But thirtie principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcar's camp, & by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day.

It neerely touched Amilcar in his honour, that the careleſneſſe of Hannibal ſeemed to be imputed vnto him, by ſending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Neuertheleſſe after many conferences, the authority of the Senators preuailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whileſt this warre laſted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred,

In the meane ſeaſon Matho was come abroad, as meaning to vſe the reputation of his late ſucceſſe, whileſt it gaue ſome life vnto his buſineſſe. He had reaſon to doe as he did: but he wanted skill to deale with Amilcar. The skirmiſhes, and light exerciſes of warre, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did ſo farre abate the ſtrength, and withall diminiſh the credit of Matho; that he reſolued to try the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his owne deſire ſhould be accompliſhed, or his cares ended. To this concluſion the Carthaginians were no leſſe prone, than Matho: as being weary of theſe long troubles, and inſupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approued it ſelfe in many trials; and well aſſured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemy hath not what to oppoſe. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouiſion: inuiting their friends to helpe; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garriſon.

The iſſue of this battaile might haue beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to preſume, ſaue their daring ſpirits, which had been well cooled by the many late skirmiſhes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginiaas had reaſon to dare, as hauing beene often victorious: and in all points elſe they had the better of their enemies; eſpecially (which is worth all the reſt) they had ſuch a Commander, as was not eaſily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the deſire of liberty ſhould worke ſo much, in men accuſtomed to ſeruitude; as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whoſe future and preſent good lay all at once ingaged in that aduenture. So the Carthaginians wan a great victory, wherein moſt of the Africans their enemies were ſlaine; the reſt fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yeelded; and Matho himſelfe was taken aliue. Immediately vpon this victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made ſubmiſſion to their old maſters: Vtica onely, and Hippagreta ſtoop out, as knowing how little they deſerued of fauour. But they were ſoone forced, to take what conditions beſt pleaſed the victours. Matho and his fellowes were led to Carthage in triumph; where they ſuffered all torments that could be deuiſed, in recompence of the miſchiefes which they had wrought in this warre. The warre had laſted three yeeres, and about foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whoſe ſubiects did not loue them, ſhould with leſſe expence, by contenting their Mercinaries, haue preuented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driuen out by the Ilanders. The faithleſſe dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

WHileſt Matho and Spendius were making terrible combuſtion in Africke; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Boſtar the Gouernour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their owne vſe. Againſt theſe, one Hanno was ſent with a ſmall Armie (ſuch as could be ſpared in that buſie time) conſiſting likewiſe of Mercenaries, leuied on the ſudden. But theſe companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their ſafety, and preſent profit, to ioyne themſelues with thoſe that were already reuolted, than to indanger themſelues by battaile, for the good of that commonweale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one courſe of fortune with them in their enterpriſe. This their offer was kindely taken; but their faith was ſuſpected. Wherefore, to take away all iealouſie and diſtruſt, they reſolued to hang vp their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath beene in all Ages, with thoſe that haue vndertaken the quarrell of an vniuſt warre, to enioyne the performance of ſome nororious and villainous act, to thoſe that come in to them as ſeconds, with offer to partake, and to aſſiſt the impious purpoſes which they haue in hand. It is indeede the beſt pawne, that deſperate men can deliuer to each other, to performe ſome ſuch actions, as are equally vnpardonable to all.

By ſuch a kinde of crueltie did the vngratefull Mantineans murder a Garriſon of Achaians, ſent vnto them for their defence againſt the Lacedæmonians, by Aratus; who, when hee had formerly poſſeſt himſelfe of their Citie, by right of warre, did not onely ſpare the ſacke and ſpoyle thereof, but gaue them equall freedome with the reſt of the Cities vnited. Theſe Reuolts are alſo common in our Court-warres; where, in the conqueſts of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depreſſion or deſtruction of old friends, we cannot be receiued and truſted by old enemies. Ce ſont les coups de vieille eſcrime. Theſe, (ſay the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

Theſe Mercinaries in Sardinia were no whit leſſe violent in their purpoſe, than were Spendius, and his aſſociates: onely they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Prouince. The Ilanders were no leſſe glad, than the ſouldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrie: but they could not agree about the profit of the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the ſouldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwiſe, the ſouldiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was deuolued vnto themſelues, by right of conqueſt. The ſame quarrell would (in likelihood) haue riſen, betweene Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common deſire of both had once taken effect: vnleſſe the riches of Carthage had ſerued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than poſſeſſion and rule of the Countrie; the matter was not eaſily taken vp. So they fell to blowes; which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driuen out, and compelled to ſaue themſelues in Italie. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refuſed, vpon reaſons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieued Matho and Spendius with corne: of whom the Carthaginians tooke almoſt fiue hundred, and held them in priſon. Hereof was made a great complaint: ſo that the Romans ſent Embaſſadours to Carthage, requiring ſatisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to diſpute: they quietly yeelded to releaſe them all. This was ſo kindely taken, that they forbad all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admoniſhing them to carry all prouiſions to Carthage. And vpon the ſame reaſon, did they forbeare to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Vtica, offering it ſelfe vnto their ſubiection. This might haue ſerued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all poſteritie: had not the iſſue proued, that it was meere regard of greater profit, which kept them ſo temperate, no longer than the hope laſted of thriuing better thereby, than they ſhould haue done by open breach of faith. The whole eſtate of Carthage depended at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilcar: who had he beene ouerthrowne by Spendius or Matho, in one maine battaile, that mightie Citie muſt either haue fallen into the barbarous hands of mercileſſe villaines, or haue humbled her ſelfe vnder protection of the Romans, with whom ſhe had lately ſtriuen for ſuperioritie. That extreame neceſſitie, whereinto Matho reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one ſallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage, was not farre from ſuch a miſerable choyce. Wherefore it was not vnwiſely done of the Romans, to make ſuch demonſtration of kindeneſſe, and honourable dealing, as might inuite a rich, but ſinking ſhippe, to runne her ſelfe aground vpon their ſhore. But when all was well ended in Africke, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recouery of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiuing that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recouered her feete againe; began to ſtrike at her head. They entertained the proffer of thoſe Mercinaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warre againſt this enfeebled and impoueriſhed Citie, vnder a ſhameleſſe pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeede againſt Rome it ſelfe. The Carthaginians knew themſelues vnable to reſiſt; and therefore yeelded to the Romans demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would haue twelue hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I ſee not not what reason they could alleadge) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inuasion from Carthage. It is indeede plaine, that they impudently sought occasion of warre. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the monie was paied, how hardly soeuer it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punick faith, in breach of Couenants: she her selfe hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purposeth to make her dearely repent; but what Amilcar liues not to performe, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renoumed sonne.

§. V.

How the affaires of Carthage went betweene the African Rebellion, and the second Punicke Warre.

THe iniurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell; serued to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson. That either they must make themselues the stronger, or else resolue to be obedient vnto those that were more mighty. In a Citie long accustomed to rule, the brauer determination easily tooke place: and the best meanes were thought vpon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The strength, and the iealousie of the Romans, forbad all attempts vpon the Mediterran seas; but the riches of Spaine, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vnknowne to Rome: wherefore that Prouince might serue, both to exercise the Carthaginians in warre, and to repaire their decaied forces, with all needefull supplies. Of this Spanish Expedition, the charge and souereigne trust was committed vnto Amilcar: vpon whom his Countrie did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recouer strength by his means, that had saued it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other enuious men that were of his faction, tooke little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to be the most worthy of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; aduising men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weale; they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisedome.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually vpheld and enlarged, by many notable seruices that he did, to the singular benefit of his Countrie. He passed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the westerne coasts of Spaine; in which Countrie, during nine yeeres that he liued there, he subiected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Prouinces. But finally, in a battaile that hee fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) he was inuironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, hee had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar; Asdrubal his sonne in law was made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practice and cunning than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subiects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow iealous againe of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauen, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it neerely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spaine, the Romans were not a little troubled; but begin to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicil, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring themselues in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) giuen them leysure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by farre exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in reuenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be inuaded by the Gaules, their ancient enemies, and neerest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if he requeſt, ſince his requeſt ſhall haue the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans vtterly deſtitute of all good colour, that might helpe them to intermeddle in Spaine. The Spaniards were then vnacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they ſcarce had heard the name: ſo that there were no Mamertines, nor other ſuch Rebels, to call in Roman ſuccours. But in the enterpriſe of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might alſo ſerue their turne in Spaine. For though it were apparent, that the Spaniſh affaires had no relation to the peace betweene theſe two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Aſdrubal had any purpoſe, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if ſome ſuch matter had beene ſuſpected) they ſent vnto him, requiring that he ſhould forbeare to proceede any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addreſſing their meſſengers, rather to Aſdrubal, than to the Citie of Carthage; they ſeeme to haue hoped, that howſoeuer the generalitie of the Carthaginians had ſweetly ſwallowed many bitter pilles, to auoide all occaſion of warre with Rome: yet the bravery of one man might proue more faſtidious, and reſenting the iniurie, returne ſuch anſwere, as would intangle his whole Countrie in the quarrell, that they ſo much deſired, and might embrace at leiſure, when once they had found apparent cauſe. But Aſdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of diſlike at all: and whereas they would haue this inſolent couenant inſerted into the articles of peace; he tooke vpon him to doe it, of his owne power, with ſuch appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and ſought no further.

If it had beene ſo, that the State of Carthage, thereunto preſſed by the Romans, for feare of preſent warre, had ratified this new compoſition made by Aſdrubal; yet ſhould it not haue ſtood bound in honour, to obſerue the ſame carefully, vnleſſe an oath had also been extorted, to make all ſure. But ſince all paſſed quietly, vnder the bare authority of Aſdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a ſecond breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accuſed more iuſtly, than they could accuſe the Carthaginians of periurie, (as they after did) for refuſing to ſtand to it.

By this Treatie with Aſdrubal, the Romans wan ſome reputation in Spaine. For when it was once conceiued by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be miſtreſſe ouer them, ſtood in feare her ſelfe, of receiuing blowes from a ſtouter Dame; there were ſoone found ſome, that by offering themſelues to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-ſeruants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will ſhortly teach them another leſſon. The Saguntines, a people on the South-ſide of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, & were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither ſubiect, nor open enemy in warre to the Carthaginians) into their ſocietie: and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vſe violence towards any that ſhould thus once become confederate with Rome. Neuertheleſſe, if we conſider the late agreement made with Aſdrubal; we ſhall finde that the Romans could haue none other honeſt color of requiring it, than an implicit couenant of making the Riuer Iberus a bound, ouer which they themſelues would not paſſe, in any Diſcouery or Conqueſt by them intended to be made vpon Spaine: in which regard, they might haue ſome honeſt pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one ſide of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other ſide of that Riuer, held almoſt all the Countrie. Howſoeuer it were, this indignitie was not ſo eaſily digeſted, as former iniuries had beene. For it was a matter of ill conſequence; that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, ſhould behold Saguntum reſting ſecurely among them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mighty Citie. Wherefore either in this reſpect, or for that the ſenſe is moſt feeling of the lateſt iniuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themſelues right: warre againſt Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they liſt. In ſuch termes were the Carthaginians, when Aſdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spaine eight yeeres: (being ſlaine by a ſlaue, whoſe maſter hee had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, ſonne of the Great Amilcar, was choſen Generall in his ſtead.

§. VI.

The estate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reigne of Philip the sonne of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long terme of the first Punick warre, and the vacation following, betweene it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne somewhat like vnto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though farre weaker, as in an after-spring. The whole countrie had recouered by degrees, a forme of libertie: the petty tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each vpon such Townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, as not onely serued to defend themselues, but to giue protection to others. This conuersion to the better, proceeded from the like dissensions and tumults in Macedon, as had beene in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach vpon it. For after many quarrels and great warres, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betweene Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning sixe and thirtie yeeres; yet so, that he was diuers times thence expelled, not onely by the Gaules, and by Pyrrhus, as hath beene already shewed, but by Alexander the sonne of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father hee had hardly wonne it. This happened vnto him, by the reuolt of his souldiours, euen at such time, as hauing ouerthrowne with great slaughter an Armie of the Gaules, hee was conuerting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receiue his Garrisons. But his young sonne Demetrius raised an Armie, wherewith he chased Alexander, not onely out of Macedon, but out of his owne Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the helpe of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kinde) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was iustly tearmed the fetter of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, stood vpon a steepe rockie hill on the North side of the towne, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the towne; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betweene the Ægean and Ionique Seas, ioyneth Peloponnesus to the maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the sonne of Polysperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Prouinces and Townes, that was made betweene Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing else, than that he was thought to be poysoned by this Antigonus, who deceiued his wife Nicæa thereof, and got it from her by a tricke. The deuice was this. Antigonus sent his yong Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicæa, and seeke her marriage. The fooliſh old widdow perceiued not how vnfit a match she was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; whereto the old King was euen as ready, to consent, as was his sonne to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the middest of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Lady, whose iealousie had beene exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauity beseeming his old age. But as hee had stollen it; so was it againe stollen from him: neither liued he to reuenge the losse of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the sonne of this Antigonus, succeeding vnto his father, reigned ten yeeres. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Achæans, held him continually busied in warre; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Gracians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the onely sonne of Demetrius, was a yong childe when his father died; and therefore Antigonus, his vncle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minority of the Prince, Prince, but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his owne sonne, to whom he left the Crowne at his death; This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Doson, that is as much as, Willing, because he was slow in his liberalitie. He represſed the Dardanians and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his reigne. Vpon confidence of this good seruice, he took state vpon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, then onely a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but were soone appeased by faire words, and a seeming vnwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Gouernement. The Achaians tooke from him the City of Athens, soone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to haue wrought him out of all, or most that hee held in Greece, if their owne estate had not bin endangered by a neerer enemy. But ciuill dissention, which had ouerthrown the power of Greece, when it flourished most; ouerthrew it easily now againe, when it had scarcely recouered strength after a long sickenesse; and gaue to this Antigonus no lesse authoritie therein, than Philip the father of Alexander, got by the like aduantage.

These Achaians from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equalitie of their Lawes, and by their clemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held vnder by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not onely draw all others by their loue and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be gouerned by one Law, and to vse one and the same sort of waights, measure, and monie.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that vnited them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had beene by the Macedonian Captaines diuided into many Principalities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they first subiected themselues, after the descent of the Heraclidæ, when Tisamenus the sonne of Orestes possest the Territorie of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whom, when his sons sought to change the Legall gouernment of their Predecessors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equall. This forme of Common-weale had continuance, with some small changes according to the diuersitie of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like ouerturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelue Citties, called the Cities of alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten vp a little before the Battaile of Leuctres; were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, diuided from each other, and trained into a warre, no lesse fooliſh than cruell, among themselues. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neere it, Ptolomie the sonne of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolomie Ceraunus, left the world; two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimæi, vnited themselues, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, which after followed. For hauing beene, some of them Partisans with sundrie Macedonian Captaines, and others hauing beene gouerned by petty Kings; they began to fasten themselues in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voyage into Italie. Now after the vniting of the Patrenses and Dimæi, to whom also the Cities of Tritæa, and Phara, ioyned themselues; Ægira chased out her Garrisons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for twentie and fiue yeeres, vsed the same forme of Gouernment with the Achaians; who by a Senatorie and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Commonweale; and soone after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynensis was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who liuing at Argos in exile, whilest his Countrie was oppressed by Tyrants, found meanes, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wise in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians entred into the Achaian league: which though at that time it receiued more increase, by their accession, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this coniunction serued well enough

againſt Antigonus, whoſe ſubtiltie was ſomewhat greater than his valor. As the induſtry and counſaile of Aratus deliuered his Country from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league; ſo further, by his great liberalitie, with the exceeding great coſt of 150. talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuerſies, betweene the baniſhed Sicyonians, which returned with him, & the other Citizens that had poſſeſſion of theſe mens Lands; as alſo with the ſame money he drew many others to aſſiſt him in thoſe enterpriſes following, that redounded to the ſingular good of al Achaia. The mony he obtained of Ptolomy Euergetes King of Ægypt; who partly had a deſire to hold ſome ſtrong and ſure friendſhip in Greece, partly was delighted with the conuerſation of Aratus himſelfe, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Ægypt, and fed his pleaſure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of Sicyon excelled.

The firſt of Aratus his great attempts, was the ſurprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadell of Corinth; which he wanne by night, being thereinto guided by ſome theeues that hee had hired for the purpoſe, who liuing in the place, had practiſed to rob Antigonus his treaſurie, paſſing in and out by a ſecret path among the rockes. Yet was hee faine to fight for it, ere hee could get it: though indeede Antigonus his Souldiers were rather ouer-come by their owne feare, than by any force of the aſſailants; as miſtruſting leſt the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and hauing loſt the aduantages of the place already, vpon which they had preſumed, before they were aware of any enemie.

In theſe kinde of night-ſeruices, ambuſhments, ſurpriſes, and practices, Aratus was verie cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, hee was as timerous. By this ſtrange mixture of cowardize and courage, he miniſtred argument of diſputation, to Philoſophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was eſteemed, and in ſome caſes approued) might look pale and tremble, when he began battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diuerſified, by the ſundry natures of men, & in a manner confined, vnto ſeuerall ſorts of action. In reſoluing which doubts it may be ſaid; that all vertue is perfected in men by exerciſe, wherein they are trained by occaſion: though a naturall inclination ſtandeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof muſt be ſupplied with much inſtruction, vſe, good ſucceſſe, and other helpe, yet hardly ſhall grow abſolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In ſincere affection to his Countrie hee was vnreproueable, and ſo acknowledged: as his following actions will truelie teſtifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and ioyned vnto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians reuolted ſoone after from Antigonus, and entred into the ſame Corporation. So did the Trœzenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew ſo powerfull, that it aduentured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argos & Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterpriſe vpon Athens was of none effect. For though Aratus waſted the Ile of Salamis, to ſhew his ſtrength, and ſent home the Athenian priſoners, without ranſome, to allure the Citie by ſhew of loue; yet the Athenians ſtirred neither againſt him, nor for him, as being now growne honeſt ſlaues to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the aduenture was carried more ſtrongly. The Achaians came ſometimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people ſtirred not: once they entred it, and might haue wonne it, if the Citizens would haue lent any helpe to the recouerie of their own freedome; ſundry times, and with diuers euents, they fought with the Tyrants, (who roſe vp one after another in Argos) in open field, and ſlue one of them in battaile; but all ſufficed not: vntill at length Ariſtomachus the Tyrant was ſo terrified, perſwaded, and hired, by Aratus, that hee conſented to reſigne his Eſtate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppreſſed the Phliaſians.

Whileſt this buſineſſe with the Argiues was on foot, Lyſiadas the Tyrant of Megalopolis was ſo well handled by Aratus, that, without compulſion, hee gaue libertie to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia: whereby he got ſuch credit, that hee was choſen Generall of their forces (which was a yeerely Office, and might not bee held two yeeres together by one man:) euery ſecond yeere, for a certaine while, he and Aratus ſucceeded one another by turnes. But thoſe late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lyſiadas and Ariſtomachus, were carried with priuate paſſion from care of the generall good; in which courſes they oppoſed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as ſhall appeare in due time.

The

The Achæans hauing obtained ſo much puiſſance and reputation, that Ptolomie King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sea and Land; made open Warre vpon Demetrius the ſonne of Antigonus Gonatas, for the libertie of Athens. It is ſtrange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had loſt a battaile, the Athenians wore Garlands, in ſigne of ioy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had wonne the victorie. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter ſeruit, aut ſuperbè dominatur; It is either baſe in ſeruice, or inſolent in command. Neuertheleſſe when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by monie, which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captaine of the Macedonian Garriſon, purchaſed liberty to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correſpondence with the Achæans, louing them, and ſpeaking well of them, which was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entred not, ſcorning it belike, in regard of their owne out-worne glorie.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increaſed within Peloponneſus, by iuſtice and honeſtie; ſo did the Ætolians, in the vtter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponneſus it ſelfe; waxe very powerfull, by ſturdineſſe of bodie, and rude courage in fight, without helpe of any other vertue. They had ſtoutly defended themſelues againſt Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to doe and ſuffer much; partly by the naturall ſtrength and faſtneſſe of their Countrie; but eſpecially by the benefit of the time, which called away theſe famous Captaines to other buſineſſe, as hath beene related. They had moleſted Caſſander, in fauour of Antigonus; and were themſelues as much plagued by him, and by the Acarnanians, a little, but a ſtout Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to doe with Demetrius, the ſonne of the firſt Antigonus, and more or leſſe, with all the Kings of Macedon ſucceeding him. They likewiſe held often Warre with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponneſus: ſo that they were hardned with perpetuall trauaile; ſeldome putting off their Armour. But their hardineſſe ill deſerued the name of valor, ſeeing they had no regard of honeſty or friendſhip; meaſurings all things by their owne inſolent will, and thinking all people baſe-minded, that were not as fierce and outragious as themſelues.

Theſe Ætolians had lately made great ſpoyles in Peloponneſus, and occupied a good part of the Countrie. They had inuaded the friends of the Achæans; taken and ſacked Pallene; where although they were ſoundly beaten by Aratus, yet their deſire of gaine made them make a new voyage thither, as to a Countrie wherein ſomewhat was to bee gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the ſonne of Antigonus Gonatas: who preſſed them ſo hardly, that they were driuen to ſeeke helpe of the Achæans; which they obtained. The warre which the Achæans made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponneſus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly vnto the Ætolians, at whoſe inſtance it was ſet on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diuerted from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very baſely the Ætolians, giuing thanks in words, deuiſed how to requite the benefit with ſome great miſchiefe. They ſaw that the Achæans were deſirous to bring all Peloponneſus into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedæmonians were very iealous. Wherefore theſe Ætolians laboured earneſtly, to ſet the Lacedæmonians and Achæans together by the eares: hoping that if this might come to paſſe, they themſelues ſhould be called in to helpe (it skilled not on what ſide) and ſo get no ſmall ſhare, both in bootie and Territorie. Neither did they forbeare to communicate this their deuice vnto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many loſſes, that this Kingdome had ſuſtained by the Achæans. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to ſuffer many indignities, rather than to giue the Lacedæmonians cauſe to take Armes. But this reſolution was taken ſomewhat too late: and not altogether in his owne power to hold. He had beene medling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedæmon: and thereby had prouoked the Lacedæmonians to looke about them; ſeeing that all Peloponneſus, excepting themſelues, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who alſo were attempted) was already become Achæan.

The Citie of Sparta was in ill caſe about theſe times; and ſubiect to the iniuries of any ſtronger Neighbor. Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it; The Ætolians entring Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fiftie thousand slaues; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Auarice and Luxurie reigned among them, the poore was oppressed by the rich, and the generositie of spirit, that had sometime beene their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more then seuen hundred natural Citizens; of whom not aboue one hundred had Lands: all the rest were needie people, and desirous of innouation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the Citie most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict obseruation of Lycurgus his lawes. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equall diuision of Lands. All the yonger, and poorer sort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who tooke their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained vp in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Counsailors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne priuate commoditie. They were hastie to take away all debts, and cancell all bonds, for they themselues were deeply indebted: but the diuision of lands they afterwards hindred, because their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which these men increased by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two aduerse Kings driuen to take Sanctuarie; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grandmother. The like to this was neuer knowne in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this crueltie proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should haue giuen Patronage to the lawes, vsing their power, and more power than to them belonged, against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and serued to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope to adioyne Lacedæmon to the Achæans Common-wealth: though it were great iniustice to take such aduantages, and attempt by force, that which would haue redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it selfe, if it could haue beene wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death of Agis, did also requite the iniust attempts of the Achæans, euen in their owne kinde: obtruding vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponnesus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedæmonians and their King, should haue beene the principall; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas hauing thus caused Agis to be slaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in marriage (perforce) to his owne sonne Cleomenes. This yong Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, and sought to win her affection, as well as he had her person. He discourst much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pittying his misfortune, began to entertaine a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himselfe to be King, whilest he was very young, hee gladly embraced all occasions of Warre: for that hee hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an estate of the Citie, had attempted to his owne ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but sought to take by surprize Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities then cõfederate with the Lacedæmonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labor of a painful nights trauell, & discouered his enmity to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing sorrie. By these degrees the warre began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discouered the Ætolian practice, & therefore would haue staied the quarrell from proceeding too farre. But Lysiadas & Aristomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so vrgent. Aristomachus was at that time Generall of the Achæans, (He and Lysiadas being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyrannie) who sent vnto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his assistance in a iournie to be made into Laconia. No disswasions of Aratus would serue

therefore he came in perſon, and tooke part of a buſineſſe, little pleaſing him in the preſent, and leſſe in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durſt not fight; but oppoſed himſelfe againſt Ariſtomachus, who deſired to giue battaile. Yet had the Achæans twentie thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than fiue thouſand in all. This gaue reputation to the Lacedæmonian, and raiſed an ill report vpon Aratus; which Lyſiadas helped to make worſe, by accuſing his cowardize. Neuertheleſſe the Achæans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but choſe him their Generall the yeere following, againſt Lyſiadas his accuſer that ſued for the place. Being Generall himſelfe, it behoued him to confute, with deedes, the ſlanderous words of Lyſiades. Therefore hee purpoſed to ſet vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, neere vnto the Mount Lyceus, by Cleomenes; who vanquiſhed him in a great battaile, and draue him to hide himſelfe all night for feare, ſo that hee was thought to haue beene ſlaine. This miſaduenture Aratus recompenced by a tricke of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly haue beene expected, had hee beene victorious. For whileſt there was no ſuſpition of any great matter that he could vndertake; he ſuddenly wrought with ſome of the Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. The Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. The Mantineans had once before ioyned themſelues with the Achaians; but ſhortly vpon feare, or ſome other paſſion, they gaue themſelues to the Ætolians; and from the Ætolians, preſently after this victorie, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus wonne. For this their leuitie they were not puniſhed, but freely admitted now againe into the Achæan ſocietie. As this good ſucceſſe repaired the credit of Aratus; ſo another battaile almoſt ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountred neere vnto Megalopolis; where the Achæans had ſomwhat the better at the firſt, but their Generall durſt not follow his aduantage. Thereupon Lyſiadas, of whom we ſpake before, grew ſomewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horſe, brake vpon the Lacedæmonians, whom he routed at the beginning, but purſuing them too farre into places of hard paſſage, he was ſlaine by them, and his followers driuen backe vpon their owne Companions; in ſuch ſort, that finally all the Armie was diſordered and put to flight. This was a great loſſe, and incenſed the Achæans againſt Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refuſed to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of thoſe Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre neuertheleſſe; wherein though Cleomenes wanne ſome Townes, and Aratus got the better in one ſmall fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achæans being wearie, and the Spartan King intentiue to another buſineſſe.

Cleomenes hauing ledde into the field all that were like to hinder his purpoſe, and tired them with painfull iournies, forſooke the Achæan warre on a ſudden, and came vnexpected home to Sparta, where hee ſlue the Ephori, and reſtored by force the ancient diſcipline of Lycurgus. Then gaue hee an account of his doings: and ſhewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched vpon the power of Kings, & many diſorders had grown in the Citie; he iuſtified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equall diuiſion of the Lands, reducing all to the firſt inſtitution. Hee alſo ſupplied the defect of Citizens, by chooſing new, out of ſuch as were friends to the State, and valiant men: ſo that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether ſtand in need of Mercenarie helpe, as it lately had done, to ſaue it ſelfe from the Ætolians, Illyrians, and ſuch other enemies. All this was diſpatched in great haſte; the Spartans well ſatisfied; and Cleomenes himſelfe ready in the field, ere his enemies could take any aduantage of theſe his domeſticall troubles.

The Achæans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long, ere Cleomenes durſt iſſue forth of the Citie, for feare of ſome rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had waſted all the Countrie of Megalopolis; had ranged ouer all Arcadia at his pleaſure; and was admitted into Mantinea; and ready to take other places, euen of Achaia. Theſe newes diſpleaſed them not a little: but they muſt patiently endure to heare worſe. For when Cleomenes had ſhaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, he proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedæmonians reſumed their ancient courage; and hee himſelfe had the heart to demand the Principalitie of Greece. Hee did not therefore henceforth contend, about the poſſeſſion of a few Townes: but aduentured to winne or loſe

all. The Aetolians, in fauour of his attempt, declared themselues on his side: and whereas he had gotten Mantinea, Tegea, and other places, to which they had some title; they willingly renounced all their interest vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrie, and saw that Antigonus with the Aetolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begunne. Therefore he deuised how to prouide against the worst, and eyther to repaire all, or (if it could not be) to saue all from vtter ruine. The office of Generall when it was next put vpon him, he refused; fearing to be so far prest, as to hazard in one battaile all the force of his Countrie, to which as he had neuer any affection, nor perchance courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For hee commonly attempted by surprise, & defended vpon the aduantage of place, after the manner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, ouer-charged with numbers of men. Yet did hee not forsake the care of the Weale-publique, though in aiming at the generall good, it seemes that priuate passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile; that Mantinea had not onelie opened her gates vnto Cleomenes, but slaine the Achean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had yeelded vnto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since Generall of the Achaans, was now reuolted vnto the enemie, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolomie was too farre off to helpe; and the neerenesse of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be vsefull, if this King would (as Polybius saith) like others, be friend or enemie, as should best agree with his owne profit. To make triall heereof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom hee found apt vnto his purpose; and instructed them how to deale both with Antigonus, and the Achaans.

The Citie of Megalopolis had beene well affected to the Macedonians, euer since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by some especiall benefits. At this time it lay neerest vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deserued succour; yet could not well be releeued by the Achaans, with their owne proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadours should bee sent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting leaue and good allowance, to trie the fauour of Antigonus in their necessitie. This was granted, for lacke of what else to answere: and the same Embassadours dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predecessors; of their present neede; and how it would agree with his honour to giue them aide. But when they deliuered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had giuen them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Aetolians, might redound to his owne great losse or danger, if the one and the other were not in time preuented; how Aratus himselfe did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achaans vnder the Patronage of Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentiue eare to their discourse. Hee embraced the motion: and to giue it the more life, hee wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so farre forth, as it might stand with the Achaans good liking. Particularly he commended himselfe, by these Messengers to Aratus; assuring them, that he thought himselfe highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceiued, not to haue beene grounded vpon any hatred to the Macedonians, but onely vpon a iust and worthy loue to his owne Nation. With this answer they returned to Megalopolis: and are presently sent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessity of the time required. The Achaans were glad to hear, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire; and therefore were ready to entertaine his fauour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his consent; and praised the wisedome of his Countrimen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest meanes of their common safetie: adding neuertheless, that it were not amisse, first of all to try their owne abilitie; which if it failed, then should they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he shewed himselfe moderate, in that which himselfe of all others did most wish: to the end, that he might not afterward sustaine the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amisse; since it might appeare, that hee had not beene Author of this Decree, but onely followed, and that leisurably, the generall consent.

Neuertheless

Neuertheleſſe in true eſtimation, this fineneſſe of Aratus might haue been vſed, with his greater commendation, in a contrarie courſe. For it had beene more honourable, to make an end of the War, by yeelding vnto Cleomenes that power which they gaue vnto Antigonus: ſince therby he ſhould both haue freed his Countrie from all further trouble; and withall ſhould haue reſtored vnto the vniuerſall ſtate of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pittie) that Vertue hauing riſen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it ſelfe, (as it were) in the ſeat of Principalitie, by length of time, and ſucceſſe of many actions; can ill endure the haſtie growth of any others reputation, wherewith it ſees it ſelfe likelie to be ouer-topped. Other cauſe to deſpiſe the Lacedæmonians there was none; than that they lately had beene in dangerous caſe: neither could any reaſon be found, why Aratus ſhould preferre Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that hee had ſtood in doubt of the one, when hee thought himſelfe more mighty than the other. Wherefore hee was iuſtly plagued, when he ſaw his owne honors reuerſed by the inſolent Macedonians; and inſtead of liuing as a companion with Cleomenes, that was deſcended of a long race of Kings, the poſteritie of Hercules was faine to doe ſacrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a god; and was finally poyſoned by Philip, whoſe Nobilitie was but of fiue deſcents, and whom perhaps hee might haue ſeene his fellowes, if hee had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the loue of Ptolomie was loſt: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though hee did not ſupply him with ſuch liberalitie, as hee had vſed to the Achæans; being warned, as may ſeeme, by their example, to be more warie both in truſting and disburſing. Cleomenes himſelfe, whileſt this buſineſſe with Antigonus was a-foot, paſſed through Arcadia with an Armie, and laboured by all meanes to draw the Achæans to battaile. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were aſſembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their eſtate, without ſeeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, & there fought with them; where he had ſo great a victorie, that the enemie was no longer able to keep the open field. The calamitie was ſuch, that Aratus himſelfe durſt not take vpon him to be their Generall, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Achæans were compelled to ſue for peace; which was granted vpon this eaſie condition: That they ſhould not arrogate vnto themſelues the command of Peloponneſus, but ſuffer the Lacedæmonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in warre. Hereunto if they would condeſcend, he promiſed vnto them, that hee would preſentlie reſtore all places taken from them, and all his priſoners ranſom-free: alſo that they ſhould enioy their owne Lawes and Liberties without moleſtation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleaſing to the Achæans: who deſired him to come to the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament ſhould be held, for the concluſion of the Warre.

Now ſeemed the affaires of Greece likely to be ſetled in better order, than they had euer beene ſince the beginning of the Peloponneſian Warres, yea or ſince the Perſian inuaſion: when God, who had otherwiſe diſpoſed of theſe matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes dranke in great heat, and thereupon fell extreame ſicke, and ſo could not be preſent at Lerna, but cauſed the Parliament to bee deferred to another time. Neuertheleſſe he ſent home the chiefe of his priſoners to ſhew that he meant none other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Achæans in their deſire of his friendſhip: who aſſembled againe at Argos, there to eſtabliſh the League. But Aratus was violently bent againſt it; and ſought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Countrimen afraid of reſoluing. When all would not ſerue turne, hee betooke himſelfe to his cunning; and ſent word to Cleomenes, that he ſhould doe well to leaue his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiuing hoſtages for ſafetie of his perſon. Cleomenes was alreadie farre on his way, when he met with this aduertiſement: and tooke it in ill part, that he ſhould be thus deluded. For it had beene an eaſie matter, to haue told him ſo much at the firſt, and not haue made him come ſo far with an Army, which afterwards he muſt diſmiſſe. Yet that which chiefly ſeemes to haue troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who ſought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale onely with themſelues and their Meſſengers; or if hee would aduenture himſelfe into the Citie, then to depriue him of all Royall ſhew, that might breede reſpect of him in the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, and for which he ſought to hinder his comming thither in perſon: leſt the people, hearing the promiſes of Cleomenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle words, and finish the bargaine without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these iuggling trickes: and Aratus was not farre behind with him, in as bitter an Oration. So betweene feare of the one, and reuerence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake vp, leauing all as it were to fortune. Cleomenes tooke his aduantage of their present weakenesse, and renewed the Warre. Many Cities yeelded vnto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force; partly by terrour, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doe. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relieue the distressed Achæans. Antigonus gaue good words as could be wished: sauing that hee vtterly refused to doe any thing, vnlesse hee might first haue Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demaund was some-what like vnto that of the Hunter, who promised to helpe the Horse against his enemie the Stagge: but with condition, that the horse should suffer himselfe to be saddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deserued, to be thus giuen away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiuing what hee intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and sent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ranne to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he sought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to saue it from Antigonus, by surrounding it within Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leaue. Whilest this was doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the Barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponnesus; promising that if he would hearken to these perswasions, then would he giue him double the same pension, which he had been wont to receiue of King Ptolemie. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured soueraigntie of the Countrey; hee desired that it might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be iointly kept by the Lacedæmonians and Achæans. All this entreaty serued to no purpose. For Aratus, reiecting vtterly the motion, sent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achæans, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes vnderstood, he seised vpon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrey of Sicyon, whereof this his Aduersary was natiue.

Antigonus in the meane time drew neere to the Isthmus; hauing passed with his Army through Eubœa, because the Ætolians held the streights of Thermopyle against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, whereunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good successe of this iourny. At his comming thither he found the Lacedæmonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard battaile, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which hee came not well prouided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able so to doe: hee secretly got into the Corinthian Hauen; but was violently driuen out againe, with great losse of men; finally he resolued to turne aside, and seeke a passage ouer the gulfe of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no lesse troubled his enemies. The Achæans were gotten into that Citie; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driuen out of the Citadell, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present helpe. Argos had alwayes beene enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes tooke it, he forbare to chase out those whom he most suspected, partly, at the entreaty of friends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that hee would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But what which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would haue been tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon, such such as were disappointed of their vniust hopes, began to turne good Common-wealths men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time; inuited the Achæans; assailed his Garrison; cut in peeces the Rescue that he sent; and compelled him at length, to forsake the defence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behind his backe. For when he vnderstood by continuall messages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almost lost: he beganne to feare, least his labour in guarding the entry, should grow friuolous; the Achæans in the meane while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsooke his custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if hee could saue, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so farre he preuailed at his comming to Argos; that both Argiues and Achæans were glad to house themselues, leauing him Master of the streets: when the horsemen of Antigonus were discouered a farre off, hasting to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himselfe (to whom Corinth was yeelded, as soone as the Spartan had turned his backe) following apace with the bodie of his Armie. Cleomenes therefore had no more to doe, than to make a safe retrait. This hee did; and got him home into Laconia: losing in short space all, or most of that which he had beene long in getting.

Antigonus hauing shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where hee wan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he tooke his way to Ægium, where was held a Parliament by the Achæans; to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and spake braue words, that filled them with hope. The Achæans were not behinde with him; but made him Captaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates; and further entred into couenant with him, That they should not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, and somewhat longer, Aratus was the onely man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon, his owne Towne (for Winter was come on) where he not onely feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargaine, if in stead of Cleomenes that would haue beene a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore; and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burden vpon the Achæans. This was hardly taken: yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe ouer-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were againe erected by Antigonus; or when the statues, which hee had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the same King, and one onely left vnto himselfe at his earnest entreatie. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spightfull. Neuertheless in taking reuenge vpon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his own passion by the ayde of these Macedonians. For with extreame torments hee did put Aristomachus to death, who had beene once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Achæans; and from them reuolting vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantineans for their ingratitude and cruelty shewed to the Achæans. For he slue all the principall Citizens, and sold the rest, men, women, and children, all for bond-slaues: diuiding the spoyle, two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achæans. The Towne it selfe was giuen by Antigonus to the Argiues: who peopled it with a Colony of their owne; and Aratus hauing charge of this businesse, caused it to bee new-named Antigonia. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuse; than euen the flattery, which Aratus was driuen to vse to Antigonus: forasmuch as it was a token of seruility, whereinto they had vrged and brought him; whom he, as in reuenge thereof, did thus requite. But leauing to speake of this change, which the comming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Ciuill state of the Achæans; Let vs returne into his warre against the Lacedæmonian.

The next Summer Antigonus wan Tegea, Mantinea, Orchomenus, Heræa, and Telphussa: Mantinea he dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus hee placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest he restored to the Achæans: with whom he wintred at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once onely Cleomenes had met him this yeare; & that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his owne Territorie. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantinea, and to those other Townes that he wanne, was this: He had few Souldiers, and had not money enough to wage more. Ptolemy the Ægyptian promised much; but would performe nothing, vnlesse he might haue Cleomenes his owne Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Ægypt, yet the aide came not. For Ptolemie was slow; as dealing in the businesse of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than vpon any apprehension of necessitie. Cleomenes therefore prouided for himselfe, as well as his owne abilitie would serue. He manumised all the Heilotes, which were the Lacedæmonian slaues: taking money for their libertie, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Hauing thus increased his forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as hauing defended it selfe in more dangerous times, and hauing now Antigonus neere at hand in Ægium. The towne he wanne: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beare Armes, rose hastilie against him; and though they could not driue him out, yet saued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Towne and goods to them againe, if they would be of his partie. But they brauely refused his offer: wherefore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that he found therein. These newes astonished the Achæans at Ægium: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in comming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore hee returned them backe to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Argos, there to passe the rest of his vnlucky winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the greeued Achæans. When hee had laine a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates; with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argiues perceiuing that their Countrie would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field; were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But he was wiser then to be moued with their clamors; and suffered them to see their villages burnt, to bid him resigne his Office of Protector vnto some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with foolish words; rather than hee would bee ouer-come in fight, and thereby lose more honor than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakning the reputation of his enemie: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other strength, vnto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for warre, Antigonus gathered together all his troups; meaning to requite these brauado's of his enemy, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keepe the warre from his owne gates; and therefore entred vpon the Countrie of Argos, where he made such hauocke, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inuasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Country of the Argiues, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, draue a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtus; and did sacrifice, as it were, before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Iuno, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorne, to borrow the keyes. These were light things; yet serued to dis-hearten the Achæan side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore hee concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by setting vp his rest, without any more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. Hee had in his Armie eight and twenty thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gaules, Epirots, Bœotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achæans, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twentie thousand, with which hee lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus comming vnto Selasia, found his enemy so strongly incamped, vpon and betweene the hills of Eua and Olympus, that hee was constrained to spend much time there, before hee could aduance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which hee greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Armie, in assayling their wel defenced Campe. Beeat length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings being resolued to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eua. But his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achæan foot, that the Spartan horse, and light-armed foot, incamped in the streight vallie betweene those hills, issuing forth, fell vpon their skirts, and not onelie

disordered them, but were like to haue endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battaile, he would haue made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Euclydas, his brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this aduantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground affoorded, whereon he lay. Philopæmen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards prooued a famous Captaine, serued then on horse, as a priuate young man, among the Achæans. He seeing that all was like to goe to rour, if their Illyrians were driuen to fall backe vpon the Armie following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achean horse, to breake vpon the Spartan Mercinaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had giuen order, that they should keepe their places, vntill they receiued a signe from him, which was not as yet. Philopæmen perceiuing them to be more orderly, then wel aduised; entreated some of his own Countrimen to follow him; gaue a charge on the Spartans; and forced them, not only to leaue the Illyrians, but seek how to saue themselues. Being so farre aduanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be wonne, through the skilfulnesse of him that held it. Wherefore hee allighted, and perswaded the men at Armes his Companions to doe the like: the folly of Euclidas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine; where they might fight vpon euen termes. So he recouered the Hill top; where though he was sore hurt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Armie came vp to him; by which the Lacedæmonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Euclydas, made Cleomenes lose the day: who fighting brauely on the other side, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himselfe, was like to haue beene surrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawne himselfe with an extraordinarie speede. In this battaile ended the glory of Lacedæmon, which, as a light readie to goe out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, then in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where he had no desire to stay, finding onely two hundred left, of sixe thousand Spartans that he had led vnto this battaile, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselues vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time lye in his owne power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before prouided against all that might happen) & imbarqued himselfe for Ægypt. He was louingly entertained by Ptolemie Euergetes; who vndertooke to restore him to his Kingdome; and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as beeing much delighted with his gallant behauiour and qualities. In the meane season hee had a pension allowed him, of foure and twentie Talents, yeerely. But this Ptolemie died; and his sonne Ptolemie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, wholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vnmindefull of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, where the troubles in Peloponnesus did seeme to inuite him, Ptolemie and his Minions, would neither giue him aide; nor yet dared to dismisse him (as he desired) to trie his owne friends in Greece, because hee was too well acquainted with the weakenesse of Ægypt: nor well knew how to detaine him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was; that with thirtie of his Countrimen, hee vndertooke a desperate enterprize: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrians to rebell and seeke their libertie. In which attempt he slue some enemies of his that hee met; and hauing walked vp and downe the streets without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) hee, and his Companions, agreed together to be ministers of their owne death. Vpon his dead body Ptolemie was bold to shew his indignation: and slue his Mother, and Children, that had beene sent thither as Hostages, together with the wiues of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpon the old Queene. Such was the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Sonne of Leonidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloudie ende, as now befell his owne Wife, Sonne, and Grand-children.

After the victorie at Sellasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta: wherein-to neuer the force of anie Enemie, before him, could make way. He kindly entreated the Citizens, and left them to their owne Lawes and Gouernment: tarrying there no longer than two or three daies; after which he hastened out of Peloponnesus, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an aduertisment that he receiued out of Macedon; how the Illyrians ouer-ran, and destroyed the Countrie. Had these newes come a little sooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few daies longer, or at least-wise tarried a few daies after the fight, in Sparta: the Kingdome of Lacedæmon would haue stood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battaile with the Illyrians, and ouer-came them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by ouer-straining his voyce; wherewith he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolemie Philopater; beganne to reigne in Asia, and Ægypt; Boyes all. Of these, Ptolemie, though old enough to loue Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seuenteene yeeres of his reigne. The vnripe age of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconuenience to their Kingdomes, as is vsuall in the minoritie of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted with the Romans; vpon which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speak of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romanes.

WHilest things thus passed in Greece; and whilest the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spaine: the Romanes had found themselues worke among the Sardinians and Corsicans, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished againe, when they rebelled. They made also warre with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little paine. With the Gaules they had much adoe, that lasted not long; being rather, as Liuie saith, a tumult than a warre. So that by all these light exercises, their valour was hardly kept from rust. Liu. Lat. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea; it hath bin shewed before: of their dealings with Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meete to be vtterly silent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slauonia: a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making warre for gaine, without either regard of friend or foe. They were inuited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to helpe the Mydionians, his friends, that were besieged by the Ætolians; for that they refused to be of their societie. Before the Illyrian succours came, the Mydionians were so farre spent, that the Ætolians contended about the booty: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, claymed to haue the honour of the victory, and the diuision of the spoyle to be referred vnto him; for that hee had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and wonne the Towne: others, that were in hope to bee chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that olde orders might be kept. It was a pretie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought vpon diuiding the prey, before they had wonne the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Ætolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, and the new Prætor, should be ioyntly intitled to the victorie, and haue equall authority in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arriued, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Ætolians, & though good resistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the helpe of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their owne busines, but stoutly sallied out of the Town. Many of the Ætolians were slain, more were taken, their Campe and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians tooke the spoyle, and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophie, inscribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The successe of this voyage, highly pleased Agron King of the Illyrians: not onely in regard regard of the mony, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the booty that was gotten; but for that hauing vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, he found it not vnsafe, to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the lesse warlike. For ioy of this he feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that hee fell into a Pleurisie, which in few dayes ended his life. His Kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left vnto Teuta, his wife.

Teuta gaue her people free liberty, to rob all sorts at Sea, making no difference betweene friend and foe; as if shee had beene sole Mistresse of the salt Waters. She armed a fleet, and sent it into Greece: willing her Captaines, to make warre where they found aduantage, without any further respect. These fell with the westerne coast of Peloponnesus; where they inuaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and stayed at the Citie of Phœnice, to take in victualles and other necessaries. There lay in Phœnice eight hundred Gaules; that hauing beene Mercinaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agrigentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to doe either, they reuerthelesse reuolted, and were for their misdeedes disarmed, and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lye in Garrison within their Towne. The Gaules were soone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phœnice; which deserued none other, in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in armes, and hastned to driue out these vnwelcome guests. But whilest the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, vnder one Scerdilaïdas, whom Queene Teuta had sent to helpe his fellowes. Vpon this aduertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Towne, and the streights adioyning, by which these new commers must enter into their Countrie; another part of them remaines at Phœnice, to continue the siege. Neither the one, nor the other, sped well in their businesse. For Scerdilaïdas found meanes to ioyne with his fellowes; and they that were besieged within Phœnice, sallied out of the towne, and gaue such an ouerthrow to the Epirots, as made them despaire of sauing their Countrie, without great and speedy helpe from abroad. Wherefore Embassadours were sent to the Achæans and Ætolians: crauing their helpe, with very pittifull tearmes of entreatie. They obtained their suit; neither was it long, before an Armie, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Scerdilaïdas. But Scerdilaïdas was called home, by letters from Teuta the Queene, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no minde to put his forces to hazzard, but offered composition, which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransome their Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their bootie and slaues. Hauing made this profitable and honourable bargaine; the Illyrians returned into their own Countrie by Land, sending their bootie away by Sea.

At their comming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For in fulfilling the commandement of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whilest they lay at Phœnice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadours were sent to require of Teuta, that she should abstaine from doing such iniuries. These Embassadours found her very iolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that she had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, saue onely the towne Issa, which her forces held streightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperity, she could hardly afford a good looke to the Romans; that found fault with her doings, and calling them by a true name, Pyracy, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, shee vouchsafed to tell them, That iniury in publike shee would doe them none: as for priuate matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subiects to get commodity, how they best could by Sea. But (said the yonger of the two Embassadours) wee Romans haue a manner, and a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publike, of those priuate wrongs that are borne out by publike authority: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, shee caused him to be slaine: as if that had beene the way, to set her heart at rest; which was indeed the meane, to disquiet and afflict it euer after.

The

The Romans, prouoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred saile, commanded by C. Fuluius; the other by Land, led by A. Posthumus. They trouble not themselues any more, with requiring satisfaction: for this iniurie is of such nature, as must be required with mortall warre. It is indeede contrary to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to be this; that since without mediation, there would neuer be an end of warre and destruction, therefore it was equally receiued by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadors should passe freely, and in safetie, betweene enemies. Neuertheless, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State, lay hold vpon Embassadors sent by their enemies, not vnto themselues, but vnto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell, then it is as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadors (thus emploied, to make the war more terrible) as it is to kill the men of war, and subiects, of an enemy. And so might the Athenians haue answered it, when they slew the Lacedæmonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a warre vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Coūtries they reside, warranted by any Law whatsoeuer. For whereas the true Office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassadour doe it without incurring iustly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place giues him no priuiledge at all. But we will leaue this dispute to the Ciuilians; and goe on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassadour Coruncanus.

The Illyrian Queene was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She was in deede in an errour; that hath vndone many of all sorts, greater and lesse than she, both before and since: Hauing more regard vnto fame, than vnto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Aetolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had she easily vanquished, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had shee considered, that her whole Armie, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; and that neuertheless, it preuailed as much, by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; she would haue continued to vse her aduantage, against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that she should not haue needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her selfe. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. Shee sent forth a greater fleet than before, vnder Demetrius of Pharos, with the like ample commission to take all that could be gotten. This fleet diuided it selfe, and one part of it fell with [a] Dyrrachium, the other with Corcyra. Dyrrachium was almost surprised by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In [b] Corcyra the Illyrians landed, wasted the Isle, and besieged the Towne. Hereupon the Aetolians and Acheans were called in to helpe: who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; losing, besides others of lesse note, Marcus Caryneusis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Towne of Corcyra, dismaied with this ouerthrow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius Pharius; who tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the meane season, Teuta was angry with her Captaine Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolued to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

b Corcyra, an Iland of the Adriatick Sea, not farre from Durazzo: called now Corfu, and in the possession of the Venetians.

The Romans were euen ready to put to Sea, though vncertaine which way to take, when aduertisement was brought to C. Fuluius the Consull, of Demetrius his feare and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduance the businesse in hand. Wherefore the Consull sailed thither; where he found the Towne of Corcyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not onely receiued him willingly, but deliuered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

c Apollonia, a Citie neere Dyrrachium, or Durazzo, vpon the Sea-coast. Pinetus cals it Sissopolis.

After this good beginning, the Consull sailed along the coast, to [c] Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he vsed thenceforth as his counsailer and guide. To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consull, with the Land-Armie, numbred at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Armie, they disperse themselues.

From

From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twenty of their ships, and enforce the Queene Teuta to forsake the coast, and to couer her selfe in Rison, far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leaue the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part staies behinde, and prosecutes the war, in such sort, that Teuta was forced to beg peace: which she obtained vpon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth, neuer send any of her ships of war, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Iland of Lissa: except it were some one or two vessels, vnarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian warre, the Romans sent Embassadours into diuers parts of Greece, signifying their loue to the Countrie, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made warre with good successe vpon Teuta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their owne games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadours were onely rewarded with thankes; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Isthmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vaine Greeks, and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, saue a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the warre betweene the Romans and Gaules, somewhat before the comming of Hannibal into Italie.

THe Gaules that dwelt in Lombardie, were the next, against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their owne forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that warre proued not answerable to the beginning, if we may giue credit vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their successe was variable, and commonly bad. Many ouerthrowes they receiued; and if they got any victory, it yeelded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce, than well aduised: lightly stirred vp to warre, and lightly giuing ouer. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gaue alwayes carefull heede to their approach, were it onely bruited. For the danger of them was sudden, and vncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, were called warres, but tumultus Gallici, tumults of the Gaules: and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italie, and vsed to rise with great Armies: but after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion serued to disperse them. Hauing receiued an ouerthrow; they would rest ten or twelue yeeres, sometimes twenty or thirty: till they were stirred vp againe, by yonger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whilest they rested, the state of Rome, that against these made onely defensiue warre, had leisure to grow, by setting vpon others. Herein God prouided well for that Monarchie, which he intended to raise: that the Gaules neuer fell vpon Italie, with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous warre. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilest Pyrrhus was trauailing in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punicke warres: it may be doubted what would haue become of this imperious Citie. But it seemes that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than strangers had in Gaule. At least, they knew not how to vse their times: and were therefore like to smart, whensoeuer the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their owne home: which was now after the first Punicke Warre. Once before this, the Romans had beene bold, to set vpon the Gaules in their own Countrie: and that was three yeeres before the comming of Pyrrhus into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gaules, inuading Hetruria, and besieging Arretium, had won a great battaile, and slaine L. Caecilius with the most of his Armie. Manius Curius the new Consull, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ransome of prisoners. But these Embassa-

Embassadors they slue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Countrie, and sent a Colonie of their owne to inhabit it. This caused the[e] Boÿ, another people of Gaule, to feare the like measure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their side. But the Romans ouerthrew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them sue for peace, which lasted vntill this end of the Illyrian warre.

[e] There were diuers nations of the Boii; as in Pannonia, Illyria, Germanie, in Bourbonois in France, and in Aquitaine; but these Boii were of the French race, and dwelt at this time about the mouth of the Riuer of Po.

It vexed the Gaules, to see a Roman Colonie planted in their Countrie; who had beene accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driuing out their Neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpines (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they were neerer; like as they called Cisalpines, or by-hither the Alpes, those who dwelt between them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their disiunction had caused their losse, so their vnion might recompence it, with large amends. But the businesse was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpines and Transalpines, fell together by the eares, putting the Romans onely to a tumult, without further trouble of warre. Soone after, they were vrged by a greater indignitie, to goe more substantially to worke. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, proposed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colonie already planted in the territorie of the Senones, as many more should be caried thither, as would serue to people the whole Countrie betweene Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating vtterly those Gaules. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it selfe, would not ouer-ioy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome tooke this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger ioyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had euer after their good will.

This dreadfull President extremely displeased the Boÿ: who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displantation. And because the rest of the Gaules had reason to resolue, that themselues also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchie of Milan, ioyned with the Boÿ, and vpon a common purse entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessates hauing receiued a great Impreſt, come to the field vnder the conduct of their Kings, Concolitanus and Aneroestus: who with the Boÿ and Insubrians, compound an Armie of fiftie thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that euer inuaded the Roman Territorie; to whom, the Senogalli, that had beene beaten out of their possessions, gaue a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the [f] Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better beleeuing in their prosperitie and rising fortune. For feare of whose incursions therefore, the Gaules were forced to leaue a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: with the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger, send Æmilius to Rimine, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Consull, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuscane.

[f] Cenomanni, are the people about Bergamo, on the Northside of the Riuer Po in Italie. There were also of these Cenomani in France, and inhabited the Countrie of Mans.

Being at this time greatly troubled, with the consideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gaules had assembled, they caused a view to be taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no lesse willing than themselues, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their owne destruction could not be preuented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserue to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consulls they sent forth to the war foure Legions of their owne: euery Legion consisting of fiue thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two hundred horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any misaduenture came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fiftie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; which Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Vmbri and Sarsinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twentie thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twenty thousand: which latter Armies were directed, to inuade the Boÿ, that forcing them to defend their owne Territories, the generall Armie of the Gaules should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these, to be ready against all vncertaine chances of war, thirtie thousand foot, and fifteene hundred horse, garrisond in Rome it selfe, of their owne people; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Ouer and about

aboue these great troupes; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent vnto the Senate, there were numbred foureſcore thouſand foot, and fiue thouſand horſe; in that of the Samnites, ſeuentie thouſand foot, and of horſe ſeuen thouſand, in that of the Iappges, and Meſſapges, fiftie thouſand foot, and ſixeteene thouſand horſe; the Lucans ſent a liſt of thirtie thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; the h Marſi, i Marrucini, k Ferentani, and the Peſtini, of twenty thouſand foot, and foure thouſand horſe. The Romans had alſo two Legions in Sicil, and about Tarentum, containing eight thouſand foure hundred foot, and foure hundred horſe. So as of the Romans and Campans ioyntly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were regiſtred two hundred and fiftie thouſand foot; and of horſe, three and twentie thouſand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fiftie thouſand foot, and about ſixe thouſand horſe. Caſting vp the whole forces of all the Prouinces in Italie, both of the Romans and their Confederates, it amounted to ſeuen hundred thouſand foot, and ſeuentie thouſand horſe. But the number is ſomewhat miſſe-caſt by Polybius; not with a purpoſe to enrich himſelfe by the dead paies: for where he reckons nine hundred horſe too many, he fals ſhort nine thouſand two hundred of the foot.

g Iappge: and Meſſapges ſeeme to be one Nation; who are alſo called Salentines, Peucecians, Apulians, & Calabrians: The Country is now Apulia, containing the Northermoſt head-land of Calabria.

h A people of the kingdome of Naples.

i Ptolomie cals them a people of Italie.

k A people of Campania, called to this day Ferentines, ſaith Leander.

How great ſoeuer this Muſter was, it ſeemes to haue beene like vnto that, which Lodouick Sforza made, when Lewes the twelfth inuaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himſelfe, and his ſubiects, he tooke a Roll of all perſons able to beare armes, within the Dutchie, though indeede he were neuer able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battailes of Trebia, Traſymene, and Canna, did not conſume any ſuch proportion, as was anſwerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their ſlaues, euen for want of other Souldiers, after their ouerthrow at Canna. Wherefore the maruaile is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of ſuch a multitude. For all heads are not fit for Helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in generall, as good fighting men, as elſewhere might be found.

Notwithſtanding all theſe counter-preparations, the Gaules keepe on their way: and entring into Tuſcane, deſtroy, and put to fire and ſword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the Roman Armie, ſent into Tuſcane, hauing taken ſome other way than they did, and finding that it had miſſed of them, came againe faſt after them, to arreſt them in their iournie. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backes, they turned head: and in the ſame euening diſcouered the Roman Armie, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant neceſſitie, that fight they muſt. Wherefore they helped themſelues with a ſtratageme: that ſhewed no great fineneſſe of wit, but ſuch, as well beſeemed thoſe that had none other occupation than warre; and ſtood them in good ſtead at the preſent. In the dead of the night, they cauſe their foot to march away, but not farre: leauing their horſe in guard; to whom they giue order, to come off at the firſt light of day, with ſuch a ſpeede, as might rather argue a running away, than a retrait, as if they had not dared to abide battaile. The Romans, interpreting this their haſtie departure, as the Gaules deſired they ſhould, follow them in diſorder. The Gaules returne; charge them, and kill ſixe thouſand vpon the place; the reſt take a peece of ground of aduantage, and defend themſelues, till L. Æmilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their ſuccour. Vpon the comming of the Conſull, the Gaules conſult, whether they ſhould giue the Romans battaile, or forbeare. In which diſpute, Anereſtus, one of their Kings, perſwades them, rather to returne into their owne Countries; where, after they had diſpoſed of the great ſpoiles and riches which they had gotten, they ſhould then renew the warre, being without carriage, peſter, or other impediment. This aduice they all embrace; for ſeeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the ſpoyles of their enemies; they thought it wiſedome, to hazzard neither it, nor themſelues, any further.

This indeede had beene a good reſolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had beene in ſight. But as well in the warres of theſe latter ages, as in former times, it hath euer beene found extreme dangerous, to make a retrait in the Head of an enemies Armie. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in alwayes going on from the purſuing enemy, they finde within a few miles, either ſtreight, hedge, ditch, or place of diſaduantage, which they are inforced to paſſe in diſorder. In ſuch caſes, the Souldier knowes knowes it, as well as the Captaine, that he which forſakes the field, perceiues, and feares ſome aduantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the betraier of thoſe ſuccours that Reaſon offereth, when it hath once poſſeſt the heart of man, it caſteth thence both courage and vnderſtanding. They that make the retrait, are alwayes in feare to be abandoned; they that lead the way, feare to be ingaged: and ſo the hindmoſt treads on his heeles that is foremoſt, and conſequently, all disband, run, and periſh, if thoſe that fauour the retrait, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miſerable ouerthrow, that the French receiued in Naples, in the yeere 1503. vpon a retrait made by the Marques of Sal, doth teſtifie no leſſe. For although a great troupe of French horſe, ſuſtained the purſuing enemy a long time, and gaue the foot leiſure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spaniſh foot ouer-tooke, and defeated them vtterly. During the wars between the Imperials, & the French; Boiſi and Mont were loſt at Brignolles, who in a brauery would needes ſee the enemy, before they left the field. So was Stroſi ouerthrowne, by the Marques of Marignan, becauſe he could not be perſwaded, to diſlodge the night before the Marques his arriuall. Therefore did the French King Francis the firſt, wiſely: when without reſpect of point of honour, he diſlodged from before Landerſey, by night; as many other, the moſt aduiſed Captaines, (not finding themſelues in caſe to giue battaile) haue done. Ie ne trouue point (ſaith the Marſhall Monluc) au fait des armes choſe ſi difficile, qu'une retrait; I finde nothing in the art of warre ſo difficult, as to make a ſafe retrait. A ſure rule it is, that there is leſſe diſhonor to diſlodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M. de la Noüe giues this iudgement, of a dayes retrait, made in France, preſently before the battaile of Moncountour. For (ſaith he) ſtaying vpon our reputation, in ſhew, not to diſlodge by night; we loſt our reputation indeede, by diſlodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight vpon our diſaduantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthy Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Naſſau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retrait at Moncountour with ſo great reſolution, as he ſaued the one halfe of the Proteſtant Armie, then broken and disbanded, of which my ſelfe was an eye-witneſſe; and was one of them that had cauſe to thanke him for it.

Now the Gaules, embracing the ſafe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings, turne their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Æmilius followes them, as neere as he can, without ingaging himſelfe, attending his aduantage. In the meane while, C. Atilius the other Conſull, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Piſa; ſo as the Gaules, incloſed betweene two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally ſtrengthen their Reare, and Front. To ſuſtaine Æmilius, they appoint the Geſſates, and the Milanois; in the Front, they range the Piemontois, and the reſt of the Gaules inhabiting vpon the Riuer of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius deſcribeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gaules fell; and ſo did Atilius the Conſull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gaules, Concolitanus and Anereeſtus, with fortie thouſand of their Vaſſals.

After this fatall ouerthrow, the Gaules loſt courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were inuaded the yeere following this ouerthrow, by the new Conſuls, Fuluius and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to vſe their victory: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeeres time, to the Gaules, to repaire their forces, as the Gaules had done to them. Theſe new Conſuls beat the Boij; but by reaſon of the great raines that fell, and the great peſtilence that reigned, they were compelled for that preſent to ſurceaſe. In the ſecond yeere, Furius, and Flaminius, inuade the Milanois; and preuaile very farre, being ſtrongly aſſiſted by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Neuertheleſſe theſe Conſulls were reuoked out of their Prouince, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to reſigne their Office: becauſe the Augures, or Soothſayers, had found, that ſome token or other of the Birds (in which, and all ſorts of their diuination, the Romans were extreamely ſuperſtitious) had not onely foreſhewed little good, when they were choſen, but had alſo nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiuing letters of this reuocation, from the Senate, and being otherwiſe aduertiſed of the contents, was not haſtie to open them: but firſt gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquiſhed them, and ſpoiled their Countrie; then peruſed the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, ſore againſt the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that he ſided in faction with the Commonaltie, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for diuiding the Countrie of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the firſt, or one of the firſt, that vnderſtanding the Maieſtie of Rome to be indeede wholly in the people, and no otherwiſe in the Senate, than by way of Delegacie, or grand Commiſſion; did not ſtand highly vpon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and vſe their power, ouer himſelfe, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their diſorders. For this, the Commons highly eſteemed him, and the Senators as deepely hated him. But he had the ſurer ſide, and found imitatours, that roſe by the ſame art; which in proceſſe of time, grew the onely or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being depoſed; M. Caudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were choſen Conſuls, for the reſt of that yeere. The Gaules about this time deſired peace, and were like to haue obtained it: though the new Conſuls were againſt it, as fearing to want worke. But when thirtie thouſand of the Geſſates, following their King Britomarus, were come ouer the Alpes, and ioyned with the Inſubrians: all other diſcourſe, than of preſent warre, was at an end. So the Conſuls haſted into their Prouince, where they beſieged Acerræ, a towne not farre from Nouaro (ſo far had the Romans pierced already) in the Duchie of Milan. To diuert them from this ſiege, Britomarus ſat downe before Claſtidium, a Towne in the ſame Tract, with great part of his forces: leauing the reſt, with the Inſubrians, to attend vpon the Conſuls at Acerræ, and to looke to the defence of Milan. But this would not ſuffice, to make the Romans breake vp their ſiege. Marcellus, taking with him the greateſt part of the horſe, and ſixe hundred foot lightly armed; thought to deale well enough with thoſe at Claſtidium. Britomarus heard of the Conſuls comming, and met him vpon the way: ſo ſuddenly, that the Romans had no leiſure to reſt themſelues after their iournie, but were compelled inſtantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a raſh brauery, loſt his game at a caſt. Hee had aduantage enough in number, both of horſe and foot: but he thought ſo well of his owne perſonall valour, that he rode out ſingle before his Armie, prouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no leſſe daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wiſe in this action, I will not diſpute; he was more fortunate, & that ſufficed to commend him. He ſlue and diſarmed Britomarus, in preſence of both Armies: whereby his owne men tooke ſuch courage, and his enemies were ſo diſmaied, that without much trouble of fight the Romans obtained a great victory.

This was the third and laſt time, that euer any Roman Generall ſlue the Generall of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victory, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof onely Romulus, Coſſus, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare ſay, that the two Scipio's, and diuers other Roman Captaines, eſpecially Cæſar, were better men of warre than any of theſe three; though they neuer offered vp to Iupiter, Opima ſpolia; The Armour of a Generall ſlaine by themſelues, when they were Generals, nor perhaps affected ſo to doe.

After this victory, Acerræ was yeelded to the Romans; and Milan ſoone after: with all that belonged to the Ciſalpines, or Gaules, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had ſo many yeers vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the Citie it ſelfe, brought to nothing in a ſhort time; their pleaſant and fertile Territorie poſſeſt by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italie, ſo many as would not ſubiect their neckes to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themſelues in the cold and barren Mountaines, like Out-lawes and Theeues. And thus did the Romans ſpend the three and twentie yeeres, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at ſuch leiſure, that they cloſed vp the Temple of Ianus: which they neuer did before, (it ſtanding alwaies open, when they had any warre) ſaue once, in the reigne of Numa; nor in long time after, vntill the reigne of Auguſtus. But this their preſent happineſſe was not to laſt long: a dangerous warre, and perhaps the greateſt that had euer beene, was to come vnto their gates; which being well ended, they might boldly vndertake, to extend their Monarchie as far, as their ambition could reach.

CHAP. III.

Of the second Punick Warre.

§. I.

The Warres of Hannibal in Spaine. Quarrels betweene the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whilest the Romans are busied with the Illyrians. Warre proclaimed betweene Rome and Carthage.

HAnnibal, the sonne of Amilcar, was about sixe and twentie yeeres old, when he was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. He was elected by the Armie, as soone as Asdrubal was dead: and the election was ratified by the State of Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine family (so called of Amilcar, whose surname was Barcas) that had command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps haue beene lesse enuied, by these domesticall enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in gouernment, and beene the onely men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generall good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Amilcar, in saiuing his Countrie from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion therenf, and enriching it with treasures and great reuenewes; so was it retained by the same good arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was vnreproueable; nor to performe the like seruices vnto the Common weale; had nothing left, whereby to value themselues, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautelous aduice of not prouoking the Romans. This they seasoned otherwhiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppresse the libertie of the Citie. But their malicious words were vnregarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no lesse Barchine, than Hannibal himselfe. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no securitie to Carthage, were she neuer so quiet, and officious; vnlesse she would yeeld to become their Subiect. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than vntill the Romans could finde some good aduantage, to renew the Warre: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilest their owne state was in good case, the warre should begin; than that in some vnhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Armie or Fleet, they should be driuen to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to giue away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, vpon tearmes of disaduantage.

This disposition of his Countrimen, Hannibal well vnderstood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deuised of this businesse) that in making war with the Romans, it was no small aduantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Armie into Italie, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and assistance, euen of those people, that helped to increase the Roman armies in forreigne wars. But this could neuer be effected, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soeuer they would be, to heare that he had set the war on foot, would neuertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen; then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discoursed of, in procuring allowance to his designe. This might suffice to disorder the whole Proiect. Wherefore, he resolued to lay siege vnto Saguntum, which might seeme not greatly to concerne the Romans; and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in minde the indignitie of that Spanish Townes alliance with their halfe friends. So should he assaie both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Hauing

Hauing thus concluded, he neuertheleſſe went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with thoſe that lay next in his way, approaching vnto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (ſaith Liuie) to giue ſome colour to his proceedings: as if hee had not principally intended the warre againſt Saguntum, but had beene drawne thither by courſe of buſineſſe. Yet reaſon teacheth plainly, that without regard of ſuch formalities, it was needefull to finiſh the conqueſt of the reſt, before he did any thing that ſhould prouoke the Romans. Firſt therefore he entred vpon the Territorie of the * Olcades; and hauing beſieged Althea (Liuie calleth it Carteia) their chiefe Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Maſter, not onely thereof, but of all the other townes of their Countrie. This Nation which he firſt vndertooke, being ſubdued, and the winter at hand; he reſted his Armie in New Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the ſpoiles he had gotten in his late conqueſt.

* A people (ſaith Stephanus) neere the Riuer of Ebro. But in the old deſcription of Spain, in Ortelius, they are found neere Tagus, and by Suidas, not far from New Carthage.

In the Spring following, he purſued the warre againſt the [a] Vaccai: and without any great difficultie, wan firſt Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, [b] Arbucala, by aſſault: though not without a long ſiege, and great difficulty. But in his returne, he was put to the heighth, both of his courage, and of his Martiall iudgement. For all ſuch of the Vaccai, as were able to beare armes, being made deſperate by the ſpoile of their Countrie, with thoſe of Salamanca, and of the Olcades, that had eſcaped in the late ouer-throw, ioyning themſelues with the Toletans; compounded an Armie of an hundred thouſand able men: and ſtayed Hannibal on the bankes of the Riuer Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisborne in Portugale. Theſe foure Nations, hauing had experience of Hannibals inuincible courage, and that he neuer ſaw enemy, vpon whom he durſt not giue charge; were throughly reſolued, that his naturall valour would at this time no leſſe neglect the cold aduiſe of diſcretion, than at other times it had ſeemed to doe, when the like great occaſion perſwaded him to vſe it. But he that makes himſelfe a body of Cryſtall, that all men may looke through him, and diſcerne all the parts of his diſpoſition; makes himſelfe (withall) an Aſſe: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or driue him. Wiſe men, though they haue ſingle hearts in all that is iuſt and vertuous; yet they are like Coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they ſee not all that they hold, on the ſudden, and at once. It is true, that this ſubtile Carthaginian, when he ſerued vnder Aſdrubal, was, of all the men of marke in the Armie, the moſt aduenturous. But that which may beſeeme a Captaine, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwayes become a Cheefe; though it hath ſometime ſucceeded well with ſuch great ones, as haue beene found more fortunate, than wiſe. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to diſſemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For hee with-drew himſelfe from the Riuer-ſide, as if fearefull to foord it; thereby to draw ouer that great multitude, from their bankes of aduantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in ſuch ſort, as Hannibal deſired that they ſhould; thruſt themſelues in furie and diſorder, into the ſwift ſtreame, with a purpoſe to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defences on the contrarie ſide. But when Hannibal ſaw them in their way, and well neare ouer; he turned backe his Elephants to entertaine them at their landing: and thruſt his Horſe-men, both aboue and beneath them, into the Riuer. Theſe carrying a kinde of Lance de gay, ſharpe at both ends, which they held in the middeſt of the ſtaffe; had ſuch an aduantage ouer the foot, that were in the Riuer, vnder their ſtrokes, clattered together, and vnable to moue or ſhift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they ſlew all thoſe, (in a manner) without reſiſtance, which were already entred into the water; and purſued the reſt, that fled like men amazed, with ſo great a ſlaughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that ſide the Riuer of Iberus, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift vp their hands againſt the Carthaginians.

[b] Arbucala, or Albricala, an inland Citie of the Vaccai in Aragon.

The Saguntines, perceiuing the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They ſent Embaſſadours to Rome, and bemoned themſelues, as likely to ſuffer that, which afterwards they ſuffered indeede; onely becauſe of their alliance and friendſhip with this honourable Citie, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moued the Senate: but much more a report, that Saguntum was already beſieged. Hereupon ſome cry out, that Warre ſhould be proclaymed by Land and Sea; as alſo that the two Conſuls ſhould be ſent with Armies, the one into Spaine, the other into Africke. But others went more Roman-like to worke, and carried it. So it was onely concluded; that Embassadours should be sent into Spaine, to view the state of their Confederates: which were indeede none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would giue them, ere it were long, a more plausible occasion to take armes against him: if he had no such purpose, yet would it be in their power, to determine what they listed themselues, vpon the report of these Embassadours; and this their grauitie, in being not too rash at first, would serue to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadours Liuie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, aud therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Historian of sinceritie lesse questionable, tels, that they found him at Carthagena, & had conference with him, though such as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embassage (as Liuie confesseth) and fall to disputation about the couenants of peace; if they had reiected that which was sent vpon none other pretence, than prevention of warre.

Whilest the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces, but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should doe as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his help against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani; a Nation adioyning to Saguntum, and hauing many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbors) of which, Hannibal himselfe had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, whatsoeuer it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first prouoked him, ere he medled with them; he made no more adoe, but sat downe with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more secure, than he had formerly beene, of his owne Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadors, with any trembling reuerence, as of late yeeres they had beene wont. Neuertheless, he was glad of any handsome colour, to shadow his actions, not onely because the warre, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italie. The Romans had the like, though contrary desire. They were glad of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their owne. Yet were they not hastie to threaten, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Armie in readinesse to be sent into Spaine, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seate of the Warre.

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King ouer a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: either for that he found himselfe ouer streightly tyed vp by them, with hard conditions, or rather because he was of an vnthankefull disposition. The commotion of the Gaules, and afterward, the fame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to haue defended and aided, in all perils, euen with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had receiued of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his owne Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Iles of Greece, against the couenants to which he was bound. Then he aduentured further and seised vpon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had stayed somewhat longer, hee might haue spedde better. For the businesse with the Gaules, was ended; with Hannibal, not throughly begun: when he declared himselfe, by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consull, Æmilius, was sent against him: who in seuen dayes wan the strong Towne of Dimalum; and thereby brought such terrour vpon the Countrie round about, that Embassadours were sent from all places, to yeelde themselues, without putting him to further paines. Onely the Citie of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which hee might haue done long, if the hot-headed Rebell had not beene too foolish. Æmilius landed a great part of his Armie, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and bestowed them in couert, presenting himselfe the next morning, with twenty ships before the Towne, & and offering to force the Hauen. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consull, & was soone intercluded from the Town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a creeke, where he had shipping ready ready for him, and embarqued himselfe: leauing all his estate vnto them, of whose liberalitie he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet preuented it not the siege of Saguntum, before which Hannibal sate downe, ere Æmilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the braue sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall receiued a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many dayes vnable to moue. Neuertheless he was not vnmindefull of his worke in the meane while; but gaue order to raise certaine moueable Towers, that might equall those which were built on the wals of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of diuers Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot assault was giuen: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not onely beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Towne, which vpon the first furie they had won; but they were pursued euen to their owne trenches and campe. Neuertheless the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an hundred and fiftie thousand men, did so wearie the Townesmen with continuall trauaile, that at length it got within the wals; and was onely hindred from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-workes of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conueyed himselfe out of the Towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so seuere, and without all compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countrimen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had; gold, siluer, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the Citie it selfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that hee would assigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carry out with them any other thing, wherewith to sustaine themselues, than the cloathes on their backes; or other armes to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better haue submitted themselues vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might haue enioyed their liues, and saued the honour of their wiues and daughters) than to haue rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did: by whom their wiues and daughters were defloured before their own faces; and all put to sword, that were aboue foureteene yeeres of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and sell their bloud at the dearest rate, they shut themselues vp like most wretched creatures in their owne houses, and therein burnt themselues with all that they had: so dying vnreuenged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Armie: the slaues, and other bootie, he diuided among his Souldiers; reseruing some things of choice, wherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them vnto the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cause to be angry at their owne slowenesse, in forbearing to send helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, but in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe reuenge. To this end they sent Embassadours againe to Carthage: demanding onely, whether it were by generall consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made warre vpon Saguntum; which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to giue them defiance. Hereunto answere was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect. That this their second Embassage, howsoeuer qualified with milde words, was indeede more insolent than the former. For in that, they onely required iustice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Commonwealth of Carthage, was vrged to plead guiltie, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spaine, in besieging Saguntum, haue onely followed his owne counsaile; or whether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske vs. That which is indeede worthy examination or dispute, is; Whether it were lawfull or vnlawfull, for Hannibal to doe as he hath done. For it belongs to vs, to call our owne Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errors; to you, to challenge vs, if we haue done any thing contrary to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Lutatius the Consull, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no diſpute. As touching the laſt agreement, betweene you and Aſdrubal, wherein you will ſay, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that haue taught vs, how to anſwere that particular. For whatſoeuer you found in the Treatie betweene vs and Lutatius, to your owne diſaduantage, you caſt it vpon your Conſuls preſumption, as promiſing thoſe things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to diſauow the actions of their Conſuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and preciſe warrant; the ſame liberty may we alſo aſſume, and hold our ſelues no way bound in honour, to performe thoſe bargaines, which Aſdrubal hath made for vs, without our commandement and conſent.

This was an impertinent anſwere, and little better than a meere cauill. For Lutatius the Conſull, in his Treatie of peace with the Carthaginians, had expreſly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had beene therefore much better, to haue dealt plainely; and to haue alleadged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Iſle of Sardinia, and withall of twelue hundred talents: which periurie the State of Carthage, being now growne able, would reuenge with open warre. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie, and forthwith inſerted their names into the Treatie of peace with Aſdrubal: ſeeing that the Treatie with Aſdrubal, and all other buſineſſe betweene Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman iniuries, as implying this commination, Doe whatſoeuer we require, elſe will we make warre, without regard of our oath, which we haue already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alleage, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the beſt of their Plea. Yet ſince Liuie himſelfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the ſpirit of Amilcar with deſire of reuenge: we may reaſonably thinke, that the mention of this iniurie was omitted, not ſo much vpon forgetfulneſſe, as for that it was not thought conuenient, by ripping vp ſuch ancient matter of quarrell, to ſhew that the warre, now towards, had long beene thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinary force; in other manner than heretofore. In concluſion, the Carthaginian Senate moued the Roman Embaſſadors, to deliuer vnto them in plaine termes the purpoſes of thoſe that ſent them, and the worſt of that, which they had long determined againſt them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; thoſe were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering vp the skirt of his Gown, as if ſomewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this ſhort reply: I haue here (quoth he) in my Gowne-skirt both Peace & War: make you (my Maſters of the Senate) election of theſe two, which of them you like beſt, and purpoſe to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Euen which of them you your ſelfe haue a fancy to offer vs. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and ſhare it among you. Which all the aſſembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had reſolued to make warre, it was meerely friuolous. For all theſe diſputes of breach of peace, haue euer beene maintained by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to ſuſtaine the warre. The ruſtie ſword, and the emptie purſe, doe alwayes pleade performance of couenants. There haue beene few Kings or States in the World, that haue otherwiſe vnderſtood the obligation of a Treatie, than with the condition of their owne aduantage: and commonly (ſeeing peace betweene ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the beſt aduiſed haue rather begun with the ſword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonis with the French in Naples; Henrie the ſecond of France, with the Imperialls, when he wrote to Briſac, to ſurpriſe as many places as he could, ere the war brake out; Don Iohn, with the Netherlands, and Philip the ſecond of Spaine, with the Engliſh, when in the great Imbarge he tooke all our ſhips and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, beſides the preſent ſtrength of Carthage, and the common feeling of iniuries receiued from theſe enemies, had another priuate and hereditarie deſire, that violently carried him againſt the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time hee did ſacrifice, being ready to take his iourney into Spaine, had ſolemnely bound him by oath, to purſue them with immortall hatred, and to worke them all poſſible miſchiefe, as ſoone as he

he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeeres old, when his father caused him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no maruell, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, haue receiued the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselues enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spaine, and Africke. His iourney into Italy.

WArre being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolued, not to put vp his sword, which he had drawne against the Saguntines, vntill he had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punicke Warre; second to none, that euer the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintred at Carthagena; where he licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselues against the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the gouernment of Spaine in his absence. Hee also tooke order, to send a great many troopes of Spaniards into Africke, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk thirteene thousand, eight hundred and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the *Baleares. Besides these, he selected foure thousand foot, all yong men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be garrisond in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serue for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their seuerall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. Hee also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftie and seuen Gallies; whereof thirty seuen were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans and other Nations strangers, he left with him aboue twelue thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Hauing in this sort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africk; he sent Discouerers before him, to view the Passages of the Pyrenean Mountaines, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gaules, to obtain a quiet passage: that he might bring his Armie entire into Italie, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romanes. His Embassadors and discouerers being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he past ouer the Riuer of Iberus, with an Armie consisting of foure-score and ten thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, hee now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that olde enemie of his house, who sate still at Carthage) to gouerne Spaine on the East side of Iberus; to whom he left an Armie of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arriued at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leaue: which that others might not also doe, or attempt, he courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Heereby it came to passe, that the iournie seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as beeing not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his armie, consisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, he past the Pyrenees, and entred into Gaule. He found the Gauls that bordered vpon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrie: but wonne them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed vpon their Leaders, to fauour his Expedition. So without any molestation, he came to the banke of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each side of the Riuer, a people called Volca. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to keepe him from passing ouer the water. But hee was greatly assisted by some of those Gaules, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Viuaretz and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselues and their goods, into the Countrie of Daulphine, phine, thinking to defend the further banke against him: yet such as remained, being very desirous to free their Countrie of so many ill guests, were better pleased to haue their Countri-men well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to haue their owne store of corne and cattell wasted, by the long stay of so great an Armie, as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the Riuer: and lent him guides. When the Vessels for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse; hee sent Hanno, the sonne of Bomilcar, vp the Riuer: himselfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foorde below. The end of this labour was: that Hanno charging the Gaules vnawares vpon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the Riuer in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with some difficultie; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was hee greatly troubled in conueying ouer his Elephants; who maruellously feared the water. He was therefore driuen to make raffes of trees, and couer them with earth and Turfe; whereof hee fastened one to each banke, that might serue as a bridge, to and from another of the same sort, but loose, vpon which the beasts were towed ouer.

Hauing past this first brunt, and ouer-come both the rage of the Riuer, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cisalpines, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had reuolted from the Romanes. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he receiued guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding; he found himselfe extreamely incombred by the Sauoians: and lost, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly hee would, or had formerlie thought that he should. For he was twice mainelie assailed by them, before he could recouer the plaine Countries on the other side. And whereas this iournie ouer the Mountaines cost him fifteene dayes trauaile, hee was euery day, more or lesse, not onely charged by those Mountainers, but withall extreamely beaten with grieuous weather and snow: it being the beginning of Winter, when hee began, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plaines, which were now ready to receiue them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often inuaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort and encouragement to goe on: hauing nothing else of difficultie remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to ouer-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely the Romane Armies, and resistance.

§. III.

How the Romans in vaine sollicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part. The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gaules against the Romans.

THE Countries of Spaine and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene sollicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, tooke Spaine in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least to dissuade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open assembly, they receiued by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answere: With what face (saith he) can ye Romans perswade vs to value your Alliance, or to preferre it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise, than so? For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, haue beene vtterly rooted out, and destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might else haue held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as wee, and other the people of Spaine haue found them. Ye may therfore be gone, with this resolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answer for the rest of our Countrimen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindnes at our hands; who are resolued, neuer to make account of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volcians, the Embassadors tooke their way towards the Gaules; vsing their best arguments to perswade them not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italie, through their Territorie: and withall greatly glorifying themselues, ſelues, their ſtrength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laught them to ſcorne, and had hardly the patience, to heare them ſpeake. For ſhall wee (ſaid one of their Princes) by reſiſting Hannibals paſſage into Italie, entertaine a war which is not meant to be made againſt vs? Shall wee hold the warre among our ſelues, and in our owne Territorie, by force, which marcheth with a ſpeedy pace from vs, towards our ancient enemies? Haue the Romans deſerued ſo well of vs, and the Carthaginians ſo ill, that wee ſhould ſet fire on our owne houſes, to ſaue theirs from burning? No, wee know it well, that the Romanes haue already forced ſome Nations of ours, out of their proper Territorie and inheritance; and conſtrained others, as free as themſelues, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enimies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

With this vnpleaſing anſwere the Embaſſadors returned home: carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather ſome aſſurance from the people of Maſſilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemie. Of this inclination, the Ciſalpine Gaules gaue haſtie proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italie, that the Carthaginians had paſſed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone ſufficed to ſtirre vp the Boij, and Inſubrius, againſt the Romans. Theſe people were lately offended at the plantation of new Romane Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian ſuccour, which they ſuppoſed to be now at hand; they laid aſide all regard of thoſe hoſtages, which they had giuen to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it ſeemes that they could not winne; for Hannibal ſhortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commiſſioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countrie) to flie to Modena: where they beſieged them. The ſiege of Modena had continued ſome ſmall time; when the Gaules, hauing little skill in aſſaulting Cities, waxed wearie, & ſeemed deſirous to haue peace, and to come to ſome good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpoſe, to draw on ſome meeting; that they might therein lay hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeeme their Hoſtages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wiſh. For the Romans ſent out Embaſſadours to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained. Manlius the Prætor, who lay in theſe quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage; marched in all haſte to the reliefe of the beſieged. But the Gaules, hauing laid a ſtrong ambuſh in a wood ioyning to the way, fell vpon the Prætor ſo opportunely, as he was vtterlie ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recouered, by faſt running, a little village, but defenſible, vpon the Riuer of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Prætors, was haſtily ſent, to relieue the beſieged, with a Legion, and fiue thouſand of the Romane aſſociates: which forces were taken out of the Conſuls Armie, and ſupplied by a new leuie.

As the Gaules were too raſh and haſtie: ſo were the Romanes too ſlow, and indeede too ill-aduiſed, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perſwaded, that Carthage, which had almoſt ſeruilely endured ſo many indignities, in time of the late peace; would bee ſo braue and couragious on the ſudden, as to attempt the conqueſt of Italy it ſelfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Conſuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Africke: reſting ſecure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius tooke his way toward Africk, with an hundred an 60. Quinqueremes, or Gallies, of fiue to an Oare, which preparation may ſeeme to threaten euen the Citie of Carthage, to which it ſhall not come neere. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Conſull, made all poſſible haſte, by the way of Genua, into Prouence; and vſed ſuch diligence, hauing the winde alſo fauourable, as in fiue dayes he recouered Maſſilia. There he was aduertiſed, of Hannibal his hauing paſſed the Riuer of Rhodanus, whom he thought to haue found buſie yet a while in Spaine. Hannibal had alſo newes of the Conſuls arriuall: whereof he was neither glad, nor ſorry, as not meaning to haue to doe with him. Each of them ſent forth Scouts, to diſcouer the others number and doings: Hannibal, about fiue hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horſe. Theſe met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, hauing ſlaine onely two hundred, and loſt of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when Scipio drew neere, to haue met with the Carthaginians; hee found, that they were gone three daies before; and that (as he then found aſſuredly true) with an intent to looke vpon the walls of Rome.

This

This interrupted his intended voyage into Spaine. Neuertheleſſe hee ſent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greateſt part of his Fleet and Army, to trie what might be done againſt Aſdrubal & the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countrie. He himſelfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Piſa; and ſo paſſing through Tuſcane into Lombardie, drew together the broken troups of Manlius & Atilius, that lately had bin beaten by the Gaules: with which forces he made head againſt the enemie, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull iournie.

§. IIII.

Scipio the Romane Conſull ouer-come by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Romane Conſuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battaile at Trebia.

FIue moneths Hannibal had ſpent in his tedious iournie from Carthagena; what great muſter he could make, when he had paſſed the Alpes, it is not eaſily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thouſand, & his horſe at twenty thouſand; others report them to haue beene onely twenty thouſand foot, and fixe hundred horſe. Hannibal himſelfe, in his Monument which he raiſed, in the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter ſumme. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that ioyned with him, are likely to haue mightily increaſed his Armie, in ſhort ſpace. But when he marched Eaſtward from the bankes of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thouſand foot, and eight thouſand horſe; of which, all ſaue thoſe remembred by himſelfe in the Inſcription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to haue periſhed, by diſeaſes, enemies, Riuers, and Mountaines; which miſchiefes had deuoured, each, their ſeuerall ſhares.

Hauing newly paſſed the Alpes, and ſcarce refreſhed his wearied Armie in the Countrie of Piemont; he ſought to winne the friendſhip of the Taurini*, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Inſubrians, which were his good friends; and refuſed (perhaps for the ſame cauſe) his amitie. Wherefore hee aſſaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three daies. Their ſpoile ſerued well to hearten his Armie; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gaules, without more adoe, fell vnto his ſide: many for feare, many alſo for good-will, according to their former inclination. This diſpoſition ranne through the whole Countrie: which ioyned, or was all in a readineſſe to ioyne with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Conſul his arriuall, made ſome to be more aduiſed, than the reſt. The name of the Romanes was terrible in thoſe quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Conſull was already gotten through the moſt defenſible paſſages, ere any ſpeech had beene heard of his approach: many ſate ſtill for very feare, who elſe would faine haue concluded a League with theſe new-come friends; and ſome, for greater feare, offered their ſeruice againſt the Carthaginians, whom neuertheleſſe they had wiſhed well to ſpeed.

* Theſe dwelt about Turine, a goodly City, now ſubiect vnto the Duke of Sauoy: which from them took the name of Auguſta Taurinorum.

This wauering affection of the Prouince, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals haſten to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pauia; where each of the wondred at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it ſtrange that the Conſul whom hee had left behinde him on the other ſide of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himſelfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the ſtrange aduenture of paſſing thoſe Mountaines, and the great ſpirit of his Enemie. Neithere were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibals ſucceſſe, and ſudden arriuall. Wherefore they diſpatched a Meſſenger in all haſte vnto Sempronius, the other Conſul, that was then in Sicilia, giuing him to vnderſtand hereof: and letting him further know, that whereas he had bin directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now their pleaſure that he ſhould forbeare to proſecute any ſuch attempt, but that he ſhould returne the Armie vnder his charge, with all poſſible ſpeed, to ſaue Italie it ſelfe. According to this order, Sempronius ſent off his Fleet from Lilybæum; with direction to land the Armie at Arminum, a Port Towne not farre from Rauenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haſte. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come ſo neere, that fight they muſt, ere they could part aſunder. Heereupon, both of them prepared the mindes of their Souldiers, by the beſt arguments they had: vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetoricke of a preſent example, that hee ſhewed vpon certaine priſoners prisoners of the Savoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italie. For these, having beene no lesse miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to bee deliuered from their miseries by any kinde of present death, were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slaine, with condition being the Victor, to receiue his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gaules were wont to vse in single combats. Euery one of these vnhappy men wished, that his owne lot might speed; whereby it should at least bee his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resoluedly: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and hauing none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon whatsoeuer vneuen termes, to ridde themselues out of slauerie. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld them, wrought also vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victorie had gotten his liberty, together with an horse and armour: but euen him also, who being slaine in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiuing what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them, beganne to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect: That hee had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaues had done; all to liue victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grieuous) to liue in a perpetuall slauerie: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselfe any hope of life by flight; since the Mountaines, the Riuers, the great distance from their owne Countries, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. Hee therefore praied them to remember, that they, who had euen now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing that there was neuer any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had euer beene broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrarie, hee told them, that the Romanes, who were to fight vpon their owne soile, and in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many waies to saue themselues by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessitie, (to which nothing seemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constraine them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, That there was no meane betweene Victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For (saith a great Captaine of France) la comodite de la retracte aduance la fuite; The commoditie of a retrait, doth greatlie aduance a flat running away.

Scipio on the other side, after that hee had giuen order for the laying of a bridge ouer the Riuer of Ticinus, did not neglect to vse the best arguments and reasons he could, to encourage the Armie he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had preuailed; and ouer how manie Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armie commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not onely so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theeues, than an Armie likelie to encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and starued, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be giuen vpon them. Nay (said he) yee your selues may make iudgement what daring they haue now remaining, after so manie trauailes and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Rosne, their horse-men were not onely beaten by ours, and driuen backe to the verie Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing our approach, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishononour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharpe swords of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people, both in Africa, and in Sicil. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being farre aduanced before the grosse of his Armie, with his Horse; and the Romans hauing also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discouered the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to beginne the fight; and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betweene their troopes, to assist them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, followed softly in good order. The Gaules (whether desirous to trie the mettall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romanes) behaued themselues couragiously, and were as couragiously opposed. Yet their foot that should haue aided them, shranke at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gaules maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they receiued; as presuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Consull vnmindfull to relieue them: their hardinesse deseruing his aide; and the hastie flight of those that should haue stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore he aduentured himselfe so farre, that he receiued a dangerous wound; and had beene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others giue the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian slaue. Whilest the Romanes were busied in helping their Consull; an vnexpected storme came driuing at their backes, and made them looke about how to helpe themselues. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to giue vpon the Romanes in flanke, and to compasse them about, whilest hee with his men at Armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened vpon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romanes were shuffled together, and rowted: so that they all betooke them to their speede, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horsemen thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of Wisedome, hauing lost so many of his Fleet vpon the first puffe of the winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extreamest of the tempest ouertooke him. For he saw by the lowring morning what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, he in a manner stole the retrait; and recouered the bridge ouer Ticinus, which hee had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left sixe hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the last that should haue passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Heerein hee followed this rule of a good man of warre, Si certamen quandoq; dubium videatur, tacitam miles arripiat fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be vnderstood in this sort: If a Generall of an Armie, by some vnprosperous beginnings doubt the successe; or find his Army fearefull or wauering; it is more profitable to steale a safe retrait, than to abide the vncertaine euent of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could passe the Riuer; Scipio the whilest refreshing his men, and easing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their Campe; the Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare, courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-desired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Aneroestus, Britomarus, and Gessates, were come to helpe them: if they had the hearts to help themselues. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Romane Campe; wounded and slue many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate; with whose heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Carthaginians, and presented their seruice. Hannibal receiued them exceeding courteously, and dismist them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more vse to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other seruice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consull stole a retrait, as hee had done before; but not with the like ease and securitie. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him; and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him: following himselfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had receiued a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of spoile, had not staid to ransacke their campe; and thereby giuen time to all, saue some few in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the Riuer of Trebia, and same themselues.

Scipio,

being both vnable to trauaile by reaſon of his wound, and withall finding it expedient to attend the comming of his fellow-Conſull; incampes himſelfe ſtrongly vpon the bankes of Trebia. Neceſſitie required that he ſhould ſo doe; yet this diminiſhed his reputation. For euery day, more and more of the Gaules fell to the Carthaginian ſide; among whom came in the Boij, that brought with them the Roman Commiſſioners, which they had taken in the late Inſurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeeme their owne Hoſtages: but now they deliuer them vp to Hannibal, as tokens & pledges of their affections towards him; by whoſe helpe they conceiued better hope of recouering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great ſcarcity of victualls, attempted the taking of Claſtidium, a Towne wherein the Romanes had laid vp all their ſtore and munition. But there needed no force; a Brunduſian whom the Romanes had truſted with keeping it, ſold it for a little monie.

The newes of theſe diſaſters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a deſire of haſtie reuenge, than any great ſorrow for their loſſe receiued; ſeeing that in a manner, all their foot, wherein their ſtrength and hope conſiſted, were as yet entire. They therefore haſted away Sempronius, that was newly arriued, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him ſent out of Sicil, awaited his comming. Hee therefore haſted hither; and from thence he marched ſpeedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the bankes of Trebia. Both the Armies being ioyned in one, the Conſuls deuiſed about that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiuing from Scipio the relation of what had paſſed ſince Hannibals arriuall; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or miſaduenture the Romanes were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the reuolt and treaſon of the Gaules.

Sempronius, hauing receiued from Scipio the ſtate of the affaires in thoſe parts; ſought by all meanes to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recouered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchaſe to himſelfe the ſole glorie of the victory, which he had alreadie, in his imagination, certainely obtained. Hee alſo feared the election of the new Conſuls: his owne time beeing well-neere expired. But Scipio perſwaded the contrarie; obiecting the vnskilfulneſs of the new-come Souldiers: and withall gaue him good reaſon, to aſſure him that the Gaules, naturally vnconſtant, were vpon termes of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians; thoſe of them inhabiting between the Riuers of Trebia, and Po, being alreadie reuolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haſte to finde out the diſhonor which he might otherwiſe eaſily haue auoided. This reſolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleaſing to Hannibal: who feared nothing ſo much as delay and loſſe of time. For the ſtrength of his Armie, conſiſting in ſtrangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules; he no leſſe feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatiencie of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many paſſions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the deſire of Sempronius, it fell out ſo, that about the ſame time, the Gaules inhabiting neere vnto Trebia, complained of iniuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not ſupply Hannibal with neceſſaries, as he ſuppoſed that they might haue done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their ſakes, and to ſet them at libertie, he had vndertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, hee was bold to be his owne Caruer; and tooke from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they flie to the Romanes for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, ſay that this wrong is done them, becauſe they refuſed to ioyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: hee ſuſpected their falſhood, and was aſſured of their mutabilitie. But Sempronius affirmed, that it ſtood with the honor of Rome, to preſerue their Confederates from ſuffering iniurie: and that hereby might be wonne the friendſhip of all the Gaules. Therefore hee ſent out a thouſand horſe: which comming vnlooked for vpon Hanibal his forragers, and finding them heauy loaden, cut many of them in peeces, and chaſed the reſt euen into their own campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians ſallie out againſt them: who cauſed them to retire faſter then they came. Sempronius was readie to backe his owne men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armie was drawne forth; and a battaile readie to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refuſed it.

This victorie (for ſo the Conſull would haue it called) made the Romanes in generall desirous to try the maine chance in open field: all the perswasions of Scipio to the contrarie notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was aduertised by the Gaules, his spies, that were in the Romane Campe. Therefore he bethought himselfe how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces: He found in the hollow of a water-course, ouer-growne with high reede, a fit trench to couer an ambush. Therein he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choyce horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselues in their campe, hee led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Earely in the morning, hee had sent ouer Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse: to braue the enemie, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunitie to fight: and therefore not onely issued out of his Campe, but foorded the Riuer of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and coole their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: hauing of the one, sixteene, of the other, twentie thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the flankes with three thousand horse: thrusting their light-armed, and Darters, in loose troups in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equall to their enemies; in horse, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flankes of their foot, were broken by the Numidians; when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gaules, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares prest in the Reare, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush: then fell the Romanes, by heapes, vnder the enemies swords; and being beaten downe, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the Riuer, by the horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of sixe and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errours Sempronius committed, of which euery one deserued to bee recompenced with the losse that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champaine, being by farre inferiour in horse, and withall thereby subiect to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-euen grounds and wood-lands, would haue been of no vse. His second error was, that he made no discouerie of the place vpon which he fought; whereby he was grossely ouer-reacht, and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that hee drencht his footmen with emptie stomackes, in the Riuer of Trebia, euen in a most cold and frostie day, wherby in effect they lost the vse of their limbs. For as one saith well; There is nothing more inconuenient and perillous, than to present an Armie tyred with trauaile, to an enemie fresh and fed; since where the strength of bodie faileth, the generositie of minde is but as an vnprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceiued him not, because of the showres; or would not perceiue him, because they were ouer-wearied. Sempronius escaped with extreame danger; flying through the Countrie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horse. He was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer, than could haue made resistance, if the enemie had met with him. Neuertheless hee got away, and came to Rome, where he did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeere following: and then returned into his Prouince, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

§. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Cisalpine Gaules into Hetruria. Flaminius the Romane Consul slain; & his Army destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thrasymen.

THe Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vnfit for seruice: to the great contentment of the Romanes, who being not able to keepe the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Ceremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet: but vexed them with continuall Alarmes; assayling diuers places; and taking some; beating the Gaules their adherents; and winning the Lygurians to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Romane Quæstors or Treasurers, Treasurers, two Colonels and fiue Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loaden with yrons, and miserably fedde: those of their followers he not onely well entreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransome; with this protestation, That hee therefore vndertooke the Warre in Italie to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these meanes he hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such perswasions. They stood in feare, lest he should make their Countrie the seate of Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieued than reason willed them, at his feeding vpon them, and wasting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gaue him the aduice, were readie soone after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. Hee was therefore glad to vse Perwigs of haire, and false beards of diuers colours, to the end that hee might not bee descried, nor knowne, to those that should vndertake to make him away. Faine hee would haue passed the Appenines, vpon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gaules, till he had seene more Swallowes than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolued to take his leaue of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre neerer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, hauing his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules; more seruiceable friends, abroad, than in their owne Countrie. That the passage of the Appenine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Romane Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was trauailing through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all waies foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that iournie. Neuertheless to auoid the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to haue beene erected vpon the ordinarie passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogges, hee lost all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vse of one of his eyes; by the moystnesse of the ayre, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe myre and water. In briefe, after he had with much adoe recouered the firm and fertile Plaines; he lodged about Arretium: where hee somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, & Cn. Seruilius had of late been chosen Consuls for this yere: Seruilius, a tractable man, & wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate; Flaminius, an hot-headed popular Orator; who hauing once been robbed (as hee thought) of his Consulship, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be serued so againe, vnlesse hee quickly finished the warre. This iealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome; when hee entred into his Office, lest his aduersaries, by fayning some religious impediment, should detaine him within the Citie, or finde other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that he hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore hee departed secretly out of the Towne; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Arimi-num. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, reuoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their iniunction; and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, tooke his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consul, promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victorie. Therefore he prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman: hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Seruilius came with the rest of the Armie. All the Countrie betweene Fesula and Arretium he put to fire and sword, euen vnder the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him stirre, that would not haue sitten still, though Hannibal had beene quiet. It is true, that a great Captaine of France hath said; Pays gaſté n'eſté pas perdu; A wasted Countrie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour to bee much impaired; and therefore aduanced towards the Enemie. Many aduised him (which had indeed beene best) to haue patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this hee could not abide to heare: saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilest the Carthaginians went burning downe all Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore hee tooke horse; and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Enfignes ſtucke ſo faſt in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Enſigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or falſe, Tullie makes a ieaſt: ſaying, that the cowardlie knaue did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) hauing hardily pitched it into the earth. Neither was the anſwere of Flaminius (if it were true) diſagreeable hereto: for he commanded, that it ſhould be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weake to lift it: asking withall; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their iealouſie both hee, and the Senate that did giue him cauſe, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Thraſymene, was on a light fire, which whileſt the Conſull thought to quench with his enemies bloud, hee purſued Hannibal ſo vnaduiſedly, that hee fell with his whole Armie, into an ambuſh cunningly laid for him, betweene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was hee charged vnawares, on all ſides, (ſaue onely where that great Lake of Peruſia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flie from them) knowing not which way to turne, or make reſiſtance. So was hee ſlaine in the place, accompanied with fifteene thouſand dead carkaſſes of his Countrimen. About ſixe thouſand of his men, that had the Vantguard, tooke courage, as for the moſt part it happens, out of deſperation; and breaking through the enemies, that ſtood in their way recouered the toppes of the Mountaines. If theſe had returned, and giuen charge vpon the Carthaginians backes, it was thought that they might haue greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which kindled by neceſſitie, had wrought the effects of hardineſſe; was well aſſwaged, when they ceaſed to deſpaire, of ſauing their liues by flight. They ſtood ſtill, in a cold ſweate, vpon the Hill-top; hearing vnder them a terrible noiſe, but not any way diſcouering how things went, becauſe of the great fogge that held all that morning. When it grew toward noone, the aire was cleared, and they might plainely diſcerne the lamenble ſlaughter of their fellowes. But they ſtaid not to lament it: for it was high time, they thought, to bee gone, ere they were deſcried, and attached by the enemies horſe. This they ſhould haue thought vpon ſooner; ſince they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For deſcried they were, and Maharbal ſent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a Village, which he ſurrounded with his horſe: and ſo they yeelded the next day, rendring vp their armes, vpon his promiſe of their liues and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refuſed to confirme; ſaying, that it was made by Maharbal, without ſufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Heerein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a tricke of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romanes, to alter couenants, or adde vnto them what they liſted; if the Carthaginians muſt be faine to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, beſides their firſt bargaine; as alſo to renounce their intereſt in Sardinia, and bee limited in their Spaniſh Conqueſts, according to the good pleaſure of the Romans, whoſe preſent aduantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal bee as a Romane, as themſelues; and make them know, that perfidiouſneſſe gaineth no more in proſperitie, than it loſeth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thouſand Italian priſoners, or thereabout, hee had in his hands: of which all that were not Romanes, hee ſet free without ranſome; proteſting, as hee had done before, that it was for their ſakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had vndertaken this warre. But the Romanes he kept in ſtraight priſon, and in fetters; making them learne to eat hard meate. This was a good way, to breed in the people of Italie, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this warre had not concerned the generall ſafetie, but onely the preſeruing of her owne necke from the yoke of ſlauerie, which her ouer-ſtrong enemies would thruſt vpon her in reuenge of her oppreſſions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by ſucceſſe of many ages, is not loſt in one or two battailes. Wherefore more is to bee done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partiſans.

Preſently after the battaile of Thraſymene, C. Centronius, with foure thouſand Roman horſe, drew neere vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was ſent from Ariminum, by Seruilius the other Conſul, to increaſe the ſtrength of Flaminius: but comming too late, hee increaſed only the miſaduenture. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this

companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yeelded to mercie, the next day. Seruilius himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gaules; against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him, of his Colleagues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discerne the fruits of popular iealousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yeerely change of their Commanders in the warres; which greatlie endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are farre better taught by their owne errours, than by the examples of their fore-goers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had beene taken vp but the yeere before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered hee himselfe to bee caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to bee preuented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honor of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had beene rewarded with shame and losse: else would he not, contrary to all good aduice, haue beene so hasty to fight, before the arriuall of Seruilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge, it is probable that he would haue taken his companion with him the second time, and haue searched all suspected places, proper to haue shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly auow it, that by being continued in his gouernment of France 10. yeres, Cæsar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Heluetians and many of the Germans, vnder the Romane yoke; into which parts had there beene euery yeere a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if euer, haue beene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeeres compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Riuers, and of all good helpes, whereby to prosecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes haue commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeeres; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wise as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they began but to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Gouernment, fitting the Countrie, they haue beene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great preiudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath euer beene the course of the World, rather to follow old errours, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouernours, to vp-hold their slothfull ignorance, by the olde examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likenesse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, haue perswaded the imitation.

§. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingring Warre. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and aduanced by the People, for bold and successefull attempting, aduentures rashly vpon Hannibal; and is like to perish with his Armie, but rescued by Fabius.

GReatly were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than euer did war, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receiue an ouerthrow; that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italie was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded vpon hate: hee onely sought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a brauerie: demeaning himselfe like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Romane name, against which he burned with desire of reuenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, & his abilitie. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long lien out of vse, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subiect vnto comptroll of the whole Citie. Wherefore this Officer was seldome chosen, but vpon some extremitie, and for no longer time than six moneths. Hee was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood vpon his prerogatiue) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Consull being dead, and the other too farre off, the People tooke vpon them, as hauing supreme authoritie, to giue the Dignitie by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of warre in the Citie. Nouum factum, nouum consilium expetit; Contrarie windes, contrarie courses. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the Horse: which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion beene also good. But if it were true (as Liuie reports it) that the bookes of Sybil were consulted, and gaue direction in this businesse of deuotion; then must we beleeue, that those books of Sybil, preserued in Rome, were dictated by an euill spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, & amplified; as hauing not bin rightly made before: also that great Plaies should be vowed vnto Iupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with such other trumperie. This vehemencie of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehemencie of feare. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sons returne aliue from Thrasymene, may serue to beare witnesse; though it be more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the City were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuers were broken downe; and all care taken for defence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal, word was brought that the Carthaginian fleete had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spaine. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Seruilius the Consull to put to Sea; and taking vp all the ships about Rome and Ostia, to pursue them: whilest he, with the Legions, attended vpon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had leuied in haste: and from Ariminum he receiued the Armie, which Seruilius the Consull had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what aduantage the Numidian horse had ouer the Romanes, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard accesse. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrie, and vsed all manner of crueltie towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom hee did put to the sword, all that were able to bear armes. Passing by Spoletum and Ancona, he incamped vpon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and ouer-trauailed Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoils that he had gotten. Hauing refreshed his Army; fed his horses; cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of the scratches, by washing their pasternes in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Prouince of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ranne, he had not taken any one Citie: only he had assaied Spoletum, a Colonie of the Romanes; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer. The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poictiers, a little before the battaile of Moncounter; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at St Iean d' Angely. But Hannibal was more wise. Hee would not engage himselfe in any such enterprize, as should detaine him, and giue the Romanes leaue to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once hee was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end hee presented Fabius with battaile, as soone as he saw him; and prouoked him with all manner of brauado's. But Fabius would not bite. He well knew the differences, betweene Souldiers bred vp, euer since they were Boyes, in warre and in bloud, trayned and hardened in Spaine, made proud and aduenturous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no other seen the enemie, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so neere, as hee kept him from straggling too farre; and preserued the countrie from vtter spoyle. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them first to looke on the Lyon a farre off, that in the end they might sit on his taile.

Now

Now Minutius had a contrary diſpoſition, and was as fiery as Flaminius; taxing Fabius with cowardiſe and feare. But all ſtirred not this well-aduiſed Commander. For wiſe men are no more moued with ſuch noiſe, than with winde bruiſed out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiſcretion, and danger, than to purſue misfortune: It waſteth it ſelfe ſooner by ſufferance, than by oppoſition. It is the inuading Armie that deſires battaile: and this of Hannibal, was both the inuading and victorious. Fabius therefore ſuffered Hannibal to croſſe the Apennines, and to fall vpon the moſt rich and pleaſant Territorie of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perſwaded, to aduenture the Roman Armie in battaile: but being farre too weake in horſe, he alwayes kept the Hills & faſt grounds. When Hannibal ſaw he could by no means draw this warie Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Townes ſtood firme for the Romans, whoſe Legions were in ſight, though a farre off; he reſolued to reſt his Armie, that was loaden with ſpoyle, in ſome plentifull and aſſured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he muſt paſſe along by the Dictators Campe, that hung ouer his head vpon the Hills of Callicula, and Caſilinum: for other way there was none, by which he might iſſue out of that goodly Garden-countrie, which he had already waſted, into places more aboundant of proviſion for his wintering. It was by meere errour of his guide, that he firſt entred within theſe ſtreights. For he would haue bin directed vnto Caſsinum, whence he might both aſſay the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promiſes vnder hand, and hinder the Romans from comming neere it to preuent him. But his guide miſ-vnderſtood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry another way, from Caſsinum to Caſilinum, whence Fabius hoped that hee ſhould not eaſily eſcape. Now began the wiſedome of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory, without blowes. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himſelfe, by a ſlight inuention, yet ſeruing the turne as well as a better. In driuing the Countrey, he had gotten about two thouſand Kine, whoſe hornes he dreſſed with dry faggots, and ſetting fire to them in the darke night, cauſed them to be driuen vp the hils. The ſpectacle was ſtrange, and therefore terrible; eſpecially to thoſe, that knew it to be a worke of a terrible enemy. What it ſhould meane, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a deuice to circumuent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were horribly afraid, when ſome of theſe fiery Monſters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore haſtily away, thinking that the enemies were behinde their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no leſſe afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armie, recouered ſure ground, without moleſtation: where he ſtayed till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with ſome ſlaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmiſh: After this, Hannibal made ſemblance of taking his iournie towards Rome: and the Dictator coaſted him in the wonted manner; keeping ſtill on high grounds, betweene him and the Citie, whileſt the Carthaginian waſted all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Towne in Apulia, forſaken by the Inhabitants; which he turned into Barnes and Store-houſes for winter, and incamped vnder the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time paſſed idlely, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about ſome buſineſſe of Religion, and left the Armie in charge with Minutius, the Maſter of the horſe.

Minutius was glad of this good occaſion to ſhew his owne ſufficiency. He was fully perſwaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by ſubtiltie and ambuſh, which he thought himſelfe wiſe enough to preuent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that ſo earneſtly, as he was preferred by iudgement of the Souldiers, in worthineſſe to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this iollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had hee beene peremptorily forbidden ſo to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whoſe command was extreame perill of death. But the honour of the victory, which he held vndoubtedly his owne; and the loue of the Armie; and the friends that hee had at home bearing Office in Rome, were enough to ſaue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer ſo hatefully. Hannibal on the other ſide was no leſſe glad, that he ſhould play with a more aduenturous gameſter. Therfore he drew neere; & to prouoke the Romans, ſent forth a third part of his Armie to waſte the Countrie. This was boldly done, ſeeing that Minutius

incamped hard by him: but it seemes, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a peece of high ground betweene the two campes, which because it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized vpon by night with two thousand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plaine force, wan it from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their neerer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to prouide abundantly, not onely for his men, but for his horses, which he knew to be the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he could giue the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countrie at will. Since therefore 1 Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his Campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harnest. This aduantage Minutius wisely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, diuided into many companies, hee sent abroad against the forragers, who being dispersed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no resistance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans tooke heart to assaile his Trenches. They perceiued that it was meere weakenesse, which held him within his Campe, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the 2 businesse, Asdrubal came from Geryon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neuertheless he did not such hurt, as hee had receiued.

For this peece of seruice Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he sent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recouered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne Campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better, that the Roman Armie had recouered spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne Campe; and that in so doing, it came off with 3 the better. Euery man therefore praised the Master of the horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: sauing that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeede in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so ioyfull of a little good lucke, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. He said that he knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that hee would teach the Master of the horse to doe so likewise; and make him giue account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish 4 confidence, the other taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons euery one cried out, especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speak, and doe what he list, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said hee) that this our onely Man, chosen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to be wasted before his eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what he meanes by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consull all this while; Seruilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and Hee, haue as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeede forborne to spoyle some grounds of 5 Fabius, that so he might bring him into enuie and suspition) and the Dictator giuing him leaue to spoyle all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is euen this: He would haue the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and haue the sole Gouernement both of our Citie, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthy. But lest, in moouing the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him iniurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will

onely propound, That the Master of the Horse may be ioyned in equall authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, not lesse necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, euen the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so iniurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the propounder, should stand vp, and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both vnto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that Dignity, whose great power, had freed the State at seuerall times, from the greatest dangers. Onely C. Terentius Varro, who the yeere before had beene Prætor, was glad of such an opportunitie, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher, afterwards became a shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbling, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being aduanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very baseneſse. And now he thought the time was come, for him to giue a hard push at the Consulship, by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot inuectiue, not onely against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, That it grieued them to see the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter of Gouernement; That they sought to humble the Commons by pouertie, and to impouerish them by warre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would soone consume euery poore mans liuing, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise: and since they had found one, (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Country, to reward him according to his good deserts; and giue him authority, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled, to proceede as he had begun. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consull, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius: and hauing finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiuing well, that he should not be able to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The news of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to diuide their authority: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them, successiuely, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equall to the Dictator, but that he should neuer be his superiour: Hee would therefore diuide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuertheless he meant to doe his best, and so taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and a halfe from the Dictator. Needefull it was (though Liuie seemes to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two seuerall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto another, nor ioyned in Commission, but haue each entire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one Campe shall not hold them both, without great inconuenience. Polybius neither findes fault with this disiunction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was vnwilling to command in chiefe successiuely (as the two Consuls vsed) with Minutius, by turnes. Hee saith that Minutius was very refractary, and so proud of his aduancement, that continually hee opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choyce, either to diuide the forces betweene them, as is said before, or else to haue command ouer all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subiection, when once they haue broken loose from the rigour of authoritie, loue nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the proofe and assurance of their libertie.

It

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no lesse carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of auoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Countrie lying betweene them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adioyning, had many, and spacious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed fiue hundred horse, and fiue thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discouered. But lest by any misaduenture they should be found out, and buried in their holes; hee made offer betimes in the morning, to seize vpon a peece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needefull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduenture vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troupes with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught, and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retrait. In this dangerous case, whilest the Romans defended themselues, losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neere, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine, perceiuing a farre off, into what extremity his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Countrey, than the disgrace which hee had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approue himselfe by hasting to doe good, than by suffering his enemy to feele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retyred: fearing to be well wetted with a showre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to haue beene saued. So from this time forwards, the Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would haue it; both whilest his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he deliuered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Seruilius the Consull had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came neuer within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed ouer into Africke; and there negligently falling to spoyle the Countrie, was shamefully beaten aboord his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicil; and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consull, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

§. VII.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and vnworthy Consul. Great forces leuied against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans prouisions in the Castle of Canna. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

With little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, heare the great commendations, that were giuen to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeede preserued them from receiuing a great ouerthrow: but he had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in apparance thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome; since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance: as if it were honorable to doe iust nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready euery man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his owne priuate losse, vpon the ill administration of the publique.

This affection of the people, was very helpefull to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoued him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his owne worth being little or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Commi-

Comminaltie were then in ſuch a moode, as abundantly ſupplied all his defects. Whereinto helpe, he had a kinſman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who ſpared not to vſe the liberty of his place; in ſaying what hee liſted, without all regard of truth, or modeſtie. This bold Orator ſtucke not to affirme, that Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and ſuffered therein to range at his pleaſure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeede with his two Legions, was likely to haue beene ouerthrowne, and was reſcued by Fabius with the other two: but had all beene ioyned together, what they might haue done, it was apparent, by the victory of Minutius, when he commanded ouer all as Maſter of the horſe; That without a Plebeian Conſull, the warre would neuer be brought to an end; That ſuch of the Plebeians, as had long ſince beene aduanced to honour by the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meaner ſort, euer ſince themſelues were freed from contempt of the more mighty; That therefore it was needefull to chooſe a Conſull, who ſhould be altogether a Plebeian, a meere new man, one that could boaſt of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could wiſh more, than to keepe it, by well deſeruing of them. By ſuch perſwaſions, the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure, to ſee a man raiſed for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honour; and therefore oppoſed him with all their might. To hinder the deſire of the People, it fell out, or at leaſt was alleadged, that neither of the two preſent Conſuls could well be ſpared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpoſe: and he againe depoſed; either (as was pretended) for ſome religious impediment, or becauſe the Fathers deſired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in choice of the new Conſuls. This inter-regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vſe at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the firſt were an hundred, parted themſelues into Tens, or Decuries; and gouerned ſucceſſiuely, by the ſpace of fiue dayes, one Decurie after another in order: yet ſo, that the Lictors, or Virgers, carrying the Faſces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited onely vpon the chiefe of them with theſe Enſignes of power. This cuſtome was retained, in times of the Conſuls; and put in vſe, when by death, or any caſualty, there wanted ordinary Magiſtrates of the old yeare, to ſubſtitute new for the yeare following. The aduantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would haue it, there needed no more, than to ſlip fiue dayes, and then was all to begin a new: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well aſſwaged. Vpon ſuch change of thoſe, that were Preſidents of the Election; it was alſo lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to ſue for the Magiſtracies that lay void: which otherwiſe was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they ſhould publikely declare themſelues to ſeeke thoſe Offices. But no deuice would ſerue, againſt the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum paſſed ouer, and the malice of the Fathers, againſt the vertue (as it was beleeued) of this meane, but worthy man, ſeemed ſo manifeſt, that when the People had vrged the buſineſſe to diſpatch, onely Terentius was choſen Conſull: in whoſe hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinary marke had ſtood for the place before; it was now thought meet, that, both to ſupply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great ſufficiency, and reputation, ſhould be ioyned with him, as both Companion and oppoſite. So L. Æmilius Paulus, he who few yeeres ſince had ouer-come the Illyrians, and chaced Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was vrged by the Nobility to ſtand for the place: which he eaſily obtained, hauing no Competitor. It was not the deſire of this honourable man, to trouble himſelfe any more in ſuch great buſineſſe of the Common-wealth. For, notwithſtanding his late good ſeruice; He, and M. Liuius that had beene his companion in Office, were afterwards iniuriouſly vexed by the People, and called vnto iudgement: wherein Liuius was condemned, and Æmilius hardly eſcaped. But of this iniuſtice they ſhall put the Romans well in minde each of them in his ſecond Conſulſhip, wherein they ſhall honorably approue their worth; the one of them nobly dying in the moſt grieuous loſſe; the other bravely winning, in the moſt happy victory that euer befell that Common-wealth.

Theſe new Conſuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noiſe, by telling what wonders

he would worke, and that he would aske no more, than once to haue a fight of Hannibal, whom he promiſed to vanquiſh the very firſt day; yet the prouidence and care of Paulus, trauailed more earneſtly toward the accompliſhment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boaſted. He wrote vnto the two old Conſuls Seruilius and Attilius; deſiring them to abſtaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuertheleſſe, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmiſh, & weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague ſhould take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might finde the foure old Legions well accuſtomed to the Enemy, and the Enemy well weakened to their hands. He was alſo very ſtrict in his Muſters; wherein the whole Senate aſſiſted him ſo carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the ſlanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raiſed it is vncertaine. Foureſcore thouſand foot, at the leaſt, and ſixe thouſand horſe, they were ſtrong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had ſo greatly deſired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Hiero, the old King of Syracuſe, as he had relieued the Carthaginians, when they were diſtreſſed by their owne Mercenaries; ſo did he now ſend helpe to Rome, a thouſand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barlie, and other prouiſions: fearing nothing more, than that one of theſe two mighty Cities ſhould deſtroy the other, whereby his owne eſtate would fall to ruine; that ſtood vpright, by hauing them ſomewhat euenly ballanced. He gaue them alſo counſaile, to ſend forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that meanes they might diuert the warre from home. His gifts, and good aduice were louingly accepted; and inſtructions were giuen to Titus Octacilius the Prætor, which was to goe into Sicil, that he ſhould accordingly paſſe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more ſerue to declare their puiſſance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of ſuch as were not eaſily drawne into the field, and fitted for ſeruice. For beſides theſe Armies of the Conſuls, and that which went into Sicil; twentie fiue thouſand, with L. Poſthumius Albinus another of the Prætors, went againſt the Gaules, to reclaime that Prouince, which the paſſage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their preſent ſtrength, might well embolden them to doe as they did. They ſent Embaſſadors to Philip the ſonne of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who hauing beene their ſubiect, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They alſo ſent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already paſt. What anſwere they receiued, it is not knowne: onely this is knowne, that Demetrius Pharius was not ſent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth began to haue an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian monie; by the ſhifts that they were driuen ſoone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little ſoeuer) would haue beene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauill about forfeiture for non paiment of the whole.

Whilſt the Citie was buſied in theſe cares, the old Conſuls lay as neere vnto Hannibal, as poſſibly as they could, without incurring the neceſſity of a battaile. Many skirmiſhes they had with him; wherein their ſucceſſe for the moſt part, was rather good than great. Yet one miſchance not onely blemiſhed the honour of their other ſeruices, but was indeede the occaſion, to draw on the miſery following. Hannibal, for the moſt part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his ſtore for the Winter. The Romans, to be neere him lodged about Cannuſium; and, that they might not be driuen to turne aſide for all neceſſaries, to the loſſe of good opportunities, they beſtowed much of their prouiſions in the Caſtle of Canna: for the towne was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not onely furniſhed himſelfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, vnleſſe they would be troubled with farre carriage. Beſides this, and more to his aduantage, hee enabled himſelfe to abide in that open Country, fit for the ſeruice of his horſe; longer than the Romans, hauing ſo many mouthes to feede, could well endure to tarry, without offering battaile, which he moſt deſired. Of this miſhap when Seruilius had informed the Senate, letting them vnderſtand, how this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would ſerue him to command no ſmall part of the Countrie adiacent; it then ſeemed needefull, euen vnto the Fathers themſelues, to aduenture a battaile with the Carthaginian, rather than ſuffer him thus to take roote in the ground of Italie. Neuertheleſſe, anſwere was returned vnto Seruilius, that he ſhould haue patience yet awile: for that the Conſuls would ſhortly be there, with a power ſufficient to doe as neede required.

When all things were ready in the Citie, and the ſeaſon of the yeere commodious to take the field; the two Conſuls, with their armie, ſet forth againſt Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great ſolemnity: eſpecially, whenſoeuer they went forth to warre againſt any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and ſolemne Vowes, were made vnto Iupiter, and the reſt of their gods, for good ſucceſſe and victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, (not onely ſuch as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for loue, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and diſmiſſed with friendly leaue-taking, and good wiſhes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited vpon Æmilius Paulus, as the onely Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honor, or likely to doe his countrie remarkeable ſeruice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no leſſe in greatneſſe, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is ſaid to haue exhorted the Conſull Paulus, with many graue words, to ſhew his magnanimity, not onely in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which hee thought harder) in bridling the outragious follie of his fellow-Conſull. The anſwere of Paulus was, That hee meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the multitude; that he would doe his beſt for his Countrey: but if he ſaw his beſt were likely to be ill taken, hee would thinke it leſſe raſhneſſe to aduenture vpon the Enemies ſword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.

§. VIII.

Diſſention betweene the two Roman Conſuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was vpon point of flying out of Italie, when the Romans preſſed him to fight. The great battaile of Canna.

THeſe new Generals, arriuing at the Campe, diſmiſſed M. Atilius one of the laſt yeares Conſuls, requeſting it becauſe of his age and weakeneſſe: Seruilius they retained with them, as their Aſſiſtant. The firſt thing that Æmilius thought neceſſary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad ſucceſſe hitherto, had gathered more cauſe of feare, than of courage. He willed them to conſider, not onely now, their victories in times paſt againſt the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but euen their owne great numbers: which were no leſſe than all that Rome at the preſent was able to ſet forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrie ſtood; how the ſtate and ſafety thereof reſted vpon their hands; vſing ſome ſuch other common matter of perſwaſion. But the moſt effectuall part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plaine force and valour: but that onely by deceit and ambuſh he had ſtolne the honour, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thraſymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconſiderate raſhneſſe of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one ſaw not his enemies, vntill hee was ſurrounded by them; the other ſcarce ſaw them, when they ſtruck off his head, by reaſon of the thicke miſt, through the darkneſſe whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their ſnares. Finally, declaring what aduantages they had againſt the Enemy; and how deſtitute the Enemy was of thoſe helpes, by which he had hitherto preuailed againſt them; he exhorted them to play the men, and doe their beſt. They were eaſily perſwaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cauſe to thinke, that vnder a Captaine ſo well experienced, and euery way ſufficient, as Æmilius was knowne to be, they ſhould eaſily preuaile againſt the Carthaginians: that came ſhort of them in all things elſe, ſaue craft; which would not alwayes thriue. But in one thing they miſtooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his deſire that they ſhould haue heart to fight; not that they ſhould loſe the patience of awaiting a conuenient ſeaſon. But they, hauing preconceiued a victory, thought all delaies to be impediments: and thereby ſought to robbe themſelues of their beſt helpe; which was, good conduct. They remembred what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselues affected with the Vulgar desire, of ending the warre quickely; wherein since Æmilius had acknowledged, that the aduantage was theirs, why did he make them forbeare to vse it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consull Terentius; who was no lesse popular in the Campe, than he had beene in the Citie. Expectation is alwayes tedious; and neuer more, than when the Euent is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terentius, who hastned their desire to effect, was likely to win more thankes, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselues to haue the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconuenience, than which few are more dangerous; Dissension of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight: Æmilius would so too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remoue hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, hauing eaten vp his last yeares prouisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Haruest? This would (said Varro) sauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth sauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their words: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably euery day. Æmilius lodged sixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vneuen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come; he doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leaue running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Neuertheless he sate downe close by Hannibal: who as an vnbidden guest gaue him but a rude welcome and intertainement. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armature, fell vpon the Roman Vantcourrers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whilest it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without losse, for that the Romans had among their Velites, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Æmilius, who could not handsomely withdraw the Armie out of that leuell ground, incamped vpon the Riuer Aufidus; sending a third part of his forces ouer the water, to lye vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselues. He neuer was more vnwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground serued wholly for the aduantage of his enemie; with whom he meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equall tearmes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remoue towards Geryon, Canna, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessaries: whereof an Armie forraging the Countrie, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed ouer with silence, That Liuie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had beene driuen; and of base courses that he deuised to take, if the Romans could haue retained their patience a little longer. Hee had (saith Liuie) but tenne dayes prouision of meat. He had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnruly Rabble, gathered out of seuerall Nations, so that he knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and runne ouer to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to haue stolne away into Gaule with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length for lacke of all other counsaile, he resolued to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieued with the more early haruest. But whilest he was about to put this deuice in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they euen forced him to that, which hee most desired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open Champaine ground: wherein hee was victorious. It was not vncommendable in Liuie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also hee may be excused; as writing onely by report. For thus hee saith; Hannibal de fugâ in Galliam (dicitur) agitâsse; Hannibal (it said) to haue haue bethought himſelfe of flying into Gaule: where he makes it no more then a matter of heare-ſay; as perhaps was all the reſt of this Relation. As for the proceſſe it ſelfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, comming out of Gaule, through the Mariſhes and Bogs of Hetruria, could finde victuailes enough, and all things needefull vnto his Armie, the Summer foregoing: what ſhould hinder him to doe the like this yeare; eſpecially ſeeing he had plaid the carefull husband in making a great harueſt; ſince he had long beene Maſter of the open field; and beſides, had gotten, by ſurpriſe, no ſmall part of the Romans prouiſions? Suteable hereunto is all the reſt. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corne and cattaile; his Souldiers might perhaps haue fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italie: and had ſo well increaſed his ſtocke, ſince he came into that Countrie, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and loaden his followers with ſpoyle: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not eaſie to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Hiſtorians: who giue it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That he alwayes kept his Armie free from ſedition, though it were compoſed of ſundry Nations; no leſſe different in Manners, Religion, and almoſt in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he ſo doe; hauing not onely pronounced, That which of his men ſoeuer fought brauely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but ſolemnely proteſted & ſworne, (beſides other rewards) to make as many of them, as ſhould deſerue and ſeeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaule, was a ſenceleſſe deuice. Hannibal, being there with his whole Armie, tooke ſo little pleaſure in the Countrie and People, that he made all haſte to get him out of it. And what ſhould he now doe there with his horſe? or how could he be truſted, either there or elſewhere? yea, how could he deſire to liue; hauing betrayed all his Army; and relinquiſhed his miſerable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Liuie. But of this and the like it is enough to ſay, That all Hiſtorians loue to extoll their owne Countrimen; and where a loſſe cannot be diſſembled, nor the honor of the victory taken from the Enemy, and giuen vnto blinde Fortune, there to lay all the blame on ſome ſtrange miſgouernment of their own forces: as if they might eaſily haue won all, but loſt all through ſuch folly, as no Enemy can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let vs returne backe to the two Armies, where they lye encamped on the Riuer Aufidus. Varro was perſwaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word vnto the people of Rome: and ſince he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the conſent of Paulus, now at length to vſe his owne authority; and, without any more diſputing of the matter to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the firſt breake of day he began to paſſe the Riuer, without ſtaying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and ſought, as in former times, to haue diſſwaded him, from putting the eſtate of his Countrie to a needeleſſe hazard. Againſt whoſe words and ſubſtantiall arguments, Terentius could alleage none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had preſented them battaile at their Trenches: ſhould they endure this Brauado? He had ſent his Numidians ouer the Riuer but euen the day before, who fell vpon the Romans that were fetching water to the leſſer Campe; and draue them ſhamefully to runne within their defences, which alſo they made offer to aſſayle: muſt this alſo be ſuffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the ſpirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was liuely, and full of ſuch courage, as promiſed aſſured victory. When Æmilius perceiued, that hee could not hinder the obſtinate reſolution of his Companion; he tooke all care, that what he ſaw muſt be done, might be done well. Tenne thouſand Roman foot he cauſed to be left behinde, in the greater campe, oppoſite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leaue behind him ſome anſwerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucity hee was leſſe able to ſpare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that theſe ten thouſand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight began, & taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly doe ſuch accidents) terrifie and diſtract the Enemies in the heate of fight. This done, the two Conſuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the leſſer Campe, whence alſo they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground on the East part of the Riuer, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and without any delay, passed likewise ouer, somewhat higher vp the streame, which ran from the South; leauing in his owne campe so many, as he thought would serue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; He bad them looke about them, and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said hee) pray for any greater fortune, than to ioyne battaile with the Romans vpon such a leuell ground, where the stronger in horse are sure to preuaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said hee further) ye are first of all to thanke the gods, that haue brought them hither; and then Vs, that haue trained them along, and drawne them into necessitie of playing for their liues, where they are sure to loose them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when ye met them first: but now yee may euen encourage your selues, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom ye haue as often beaten as seene. Of one thing onely I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, as, to driue them before you out of Gaule; and to win the open Countrie, and fields of Italie; both of which ye haue obtained: now are ye to fight for the Townes themselues, and all the riches within them; which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, yee shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this; his brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the countenance of the Enemy. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what worke they were likely to haue with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, search them neuer so diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladded the souldiers, who thought their Generall would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago aboue many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking vpon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant onely to correct the sad moode of his brother with a iest, and shew himselfe merry vnto the Souldiers: this his answere was more manly, than was the relation of his discouerer. But if Hannibal himselfe had beene sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not haue returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captaine Gam, before the battaile of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henrie the fift: saying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners; and enow to run away. Euen such words as these, or such pleasant iests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serue many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke vpon such passions, as must gouerne more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his militarie skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and vndertakings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which he had long before conceiued the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile; He marshalled his Armie in such conuenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where euery one might doe best seruice. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, hee sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdues; but when we vsed our owne termes, the forlorne hope. The grosse of his Armie following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoyles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vse of those weapons, that were of more aduantage, than those wherewith they had formerly serued; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betweene these he ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their owne Countrey manner; their shields alike; but the Gaules vsing long broad swords, that were forcible in a downe-right stroake; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their nauell vpwards, as confident in their owne fiercenesse: the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple.

This

This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitie, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gaules were strong of body, and furious in giuing charge, but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them haue inherited to this day. The Spaniards were lesse eager, but more warie; neither ashamed to giue ground, when they were ouer-pressed; nor afraid to returne, and renew the fight, vpon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, serued mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence ioyntly vnto them both. For they saw themselues well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spaine, by their Conquests; and in Gaule, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamitie should fall vpon them, whilest the wings on either side stood fast: these Barbarians had no cause to shrinke, or forbeare to imploy the vttermost of their hardinesse, as knowing that the Enemy could not presse farre vpon them, without further engaging himselfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great aduantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse: by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make a good retrait. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so liuely, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gaules and Spaniards to aduance; leauing void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall backe, when they should be ouerhardly pressed. So, casting them into the forme of a Cressent, He made them as it were his Vantguard: the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thin, as seruing onely to guide it orderly backe, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthned and thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to haue beene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behinde it: though such figures, cut in brasse, as I haue seene of this Battaile, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anone appeare: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Reare, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driuen to retrait; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betweene the last rancks of his long battalions, and in the head of his Reare, doubtlesse well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betweene the left battalion and the Riuer Ausidus, were the Gaules and Spanish horse, vnder the command of Asdrubal. On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines, was Hanno (Liuie saith Maharbal) with the Numidian light-horse. Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Reare. The whole sum of Hannibals Armie in the field this day, was ten thousand horse, and fourtie thousand foot; his enemies hauing two to one against him in foot; and Hee, fiue to three against them in horse.

The Roman Army was marshalled in the vsuall forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had beene found conuenient against the Carthaginians, in the former war. It was indeed no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Reare, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, vnder shelter whereof the disordered troupes might re-ally themselues. Thus much it seemes, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailes accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his vnderstanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their aduantage was in Horse, against which, this manner of embattailing was very vnprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than vpon a long flanke. As for Æmilius, it was not his day of command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very wearinesse vnto the more contentious. Vpon the right hand, and toward the Riuer, were the Roman horse-men, vnder the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Consul, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Seruilius the former yeeres Consul, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians hauing their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, betweene the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and slingers

slingers of the Baleares: Asdrubal brake vpon the Consull Paulus, and was roughly encountred; not after the manner of seruice on horse-backe, vsed in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giuing on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as hauing the Riuer on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake thorow. Wherefore they not onely vsed their Lances and Swordes; but rushing violently amongst the Enemies, grasped one another: and so, their horses running from vnder them, fell many to the ground; where starting vp againe, they began to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were ouer-borne, and driuen by plaine force to a staggering recoile. This the Consul Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to be resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequall both in number, and in horsemanship. 10
When the battailes came to ioyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and somewhat more then enough, to breake that great Cresent, vpon which they first fell: so strongly for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foote make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battaile drew towards the midst; by whose aide, these Opposites were forced to disband, and flye backe to their first place. This they did in great haste and feare: and were with no lesse haste, and folly pursued. Vpon the Africans that stoode behinde them, they needed not to fall foule; both for that there was voide roome enough; and forasmuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the safe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time should require. In this hasty retrait, or flight, of the Gaules and Spaniards; 20 it hapned, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the limbe or vtter compasse of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concaue surface thereof (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside outward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vntouched, onely turning round, and recoyling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe circle; which they should not haue needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottome of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and seeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot bin cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolued. But whilest the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed on vpon 30 those that stood before them, and thereby vnwittingly engaged themselues deeply within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side aduanced so farre, that getting beyond the Reare of them, they inclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not passe farre, without remouing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Cresent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as couered the Africans; who lay behinde it vndiscerned, vntill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled vnawares; and that they behaued themselues, as men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is it credible, that they would haue beene so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of slaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them 40 at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferiour Captaines: but since the Consull Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselues. Asdrubal, hauing broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consull Paulus, followed vpon them, along the Riuer side, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consull himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuertheless he cheared vp his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his owne stout behauiour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better successe. For the Consul receiued a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weakenesse, to forsake his horse. company alighted, thinking that the Conſul had giuen order ſo to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horſes, to helpe their foot in diſtreſs. When Hannibal (for he was neere at hand) perceiued this, and vnderſtood that the Conſul had willed his horſe-men to diſmount; He was very glad of it, and pleaſantly ſaid, I had rather he would haue deliuered them vnto me, bound hand and foot: meaning, that he had them now almoſt as ſafe, as if they were ſo bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horſe of his aſſociates, in the left wing, was maruellouſly troubled by Hanno (or Mabarbal) and the Numidians: who beating vp and downe about that great ſandy Plaine, raiſed a foule duſt; which a ſtrong Southwinde, blowing there accuſtomarily, drane into the eyes and mouthes of the Romanes. Theſe, vſing their aduantage both of number and of lightneſſe, wearied the Conſul and his followers exceedingly: neither giuing, nor ſuſtaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the firſt they ſeemed to promiſe him an happy day of it. For when the battailes were euen ready to ioyne; fiue hundred of theſe Numidians came pricking away from their fellowes, with their ſhields caſt behinde their backes, (as was the manner of thoſe which yeelded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendred themſelues. This was good lucke to beginne withall, if there had beene good meaning. Varro had not leiſure to examine them; but cauſed them, vnweaponed as they were, to get them behinde the Armie, where hee bade them reſt quietly till all was done. Theſe crafty aduenturers did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpoſe, for which they had thus yeelded. Vnder their iackets they had ſhort ſwords and ponyards; beſides which, they found other ſcattered weapons about the field, of ſuch as were ſlaine, and therewithall flew vpon the hindmoſt of the Romanes, whileſt all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: ſo that they did great miſchiefe, and raiſed yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine leuell ground, found meanes to lay an ambuſh at the backe of his enemies. The laſt blow, that ended all fight and reſiſtance, was giuen by the ſame hand which gaue the firſt. Aſdrubal, hauing in ſhort ſpace broken the Romane troups of horſe, and cut in pieces all, ſaue the Companie of Æmilius that ruſhed into the groſſe of his foot, and a very few beſides, that recouered ſome narrow paſſage, between the Riuer and their owne Battalions; did not ſtay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell backe behinde the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians: with whom he ioyned, and gaue vpon Terentius.

This fearefull cloud, as it ſhewed at the firſt appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other ſide: ſo did it prognoſticate a diſmall ſtorme vnto thoſe, vpon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, hauing wearied themſelues much in doing little, and ſeeing more worke toward, than they could hope to ſuſtaine; thought it the beſt way, to auoid the danger by preſent flight. The Conſull was no leſſe wiſe than they, in apprehending the greatneſſe of his owne perill; nor more deſperate, in ſtriuing to worke impoſſibilities: it being impoſſible, when ſo many ſhranke from him, to ſuſtaine the impreſſion alone, which he could not haue endured with their aſſiſtance. Now hee found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to incounter him. But of this; or of ought elſe, excepting haſtie flight, his preſent leiſure would not ſerue him to conſider. Cloſe at the heeles of him and his flying troupes, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Aſdrubal vnto the purſuit, as fittеſt for that ſeruice. Aſdrubal himſelfe, with the Gaules and Spaniſh horſe, compaſſing about, fell vpon the backes of the Romanes; that were ere this hardly diſtreſſed, and in a manner ſurrounded on all parts elſe. Hee brake them eaſily; who before made ill reſiſtance, being incloſed, and laid at on euery ſide, not knowing which way to turne. Heere began a pitifull ſlaughter: the vanquiſhed multitude thronging vp and downe, they knew not whither or which way, whileſt euery one ſought to auoid thoſe enemies, whom he ſaw neereſt. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Æmilius, got vp to horſe, and ſaued themſelues: which though it is hardly vnderſtood how they could doe; yet I will rather beleeue it, than ſuppoſe that Liuie ſo reporteth, to grace thereby his Hiſtorie with this following tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place, where hee ſaw the Conſull ſitting all blaudied vpon a ſtone, entreated him to riſe and ſaue himſelfe; offering him his aſſiſtance and horſe. But Paulus refuſed it; willing Lentulus to ſhift for himſelfe, and not to loſe time: ſaying, That it was not his purpoſe to bee brought againe into iudgement by the People, either as an accuſer of his Colleague, or as guiltie himſelfe selfe of that dayes losse. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to fortifie Rome, as fast and well as they could; and telling Fabius, that hee lived and died mindefull of his wholesome counsaile. These words (peradventure) or some to like purpose, the Consul vttered to Lentulus, either when against his will he was drawne to that Battaile, or when he beheld the first defeat of his Horse; at what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he said a good while before this; when he thought the Consull & his troupe, in little better case than if they had beene bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeede as within a sacke; whereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gaules, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottome; and Asdrubal with his horse, closed vp the mouth: in which part, they first of all were shuffled together, and beganne the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Æmilius therefore, who could not sit his horse, whilest the battaile yet lasted, and whilest the spaces were somewhat open, by which he might haue withdrawne himselfe; was now (had he neuer so well bin mounted) vnable to flie, hauing in his way so close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth vnto his honour, That in the Battaile he fought no lesse valiantly, than he had warily before, both abstained himselfe, and disswaded his fellow-Consull, from fighting at all. If, when the day was vtterly lost, it had laine in his power to saue his own life, vnto the good of his Countrie, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that hee either too much disesteemed himselfe; or being too faintly minded, was wearie of the World, and his vnthankefull Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Æmilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord Iohn Talbot, Viscount Lisle, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewsburie, who died in the Battaile of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Æmilius was old, grieuously, if not mortally, wounded, and accomptable for the ouerthrow receiued: Talbot was in the flowre of his youth, vnhurt, easily able to haue escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when hee refused to forsake his Father; who foreseeing the losse of the battaile, and not meaning to staine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone and leaue him.

In this terrible ouerthrow died all the Roman foot, saue two or three thousand, who (as Liuie saith) escaped into the lesser campe; whence, the same night, about sixe hundred of them brake forth, and ioyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conueyed themselues away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troups, partly dispersed, into Cannusium: the next day, the Roman Camps, both lesse and greater, were yeelded vnto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: onely he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Æmilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-neere done, the battaile was lost: and Hannibal, comming ouer the water to them, draue them into their owne campe; which they quickly yeelded, hauing lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first sight of Hannibal, comming vpon them with his victorious Armie, a greater number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vaine, retired into their campe, and held the enemie busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made vp by addition of others; whose fault or fortune was like) that hauing serued at Canna, were afterwards extreamely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Romane horse what numbers escaped, it is vncertaine: but very few they were that saued themselues in the first charge, by getting behinde the Riuer; and Terentius the Consul recouered Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his companie. That hee was so ill attended, it is no maruell; for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his neerest way thither, had beene through the midst of Hannibals Armie, if the passage had beene open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned vp some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted eum re. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but tooke other waies, and were scattered ouer the fields; two thousand, or thereabouts, were gathered vp by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all saue three hundred; who dispersed themselues in flight, as chance led led them, and got into sundry Townes. There died in this great Battaile of Canna, besides Lucius Paulus the Consul, two of the Romane Quæstors or Treasurers, and one and twentie Colonells or Tribunes of the Souldiers, fourescore Senators, or such as had borne Office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall marke, as having beene Ædiles, Praetors, or Consuls: among whom was Cn. Seruilius the last yeeres Consul, and Minutius late master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaile, Liuie makes no greater than three thousand foote, and three hundred horse: told few to haue defended for the space of one halfe houre, both the Roman Camps; which yet the same Liuie saith, to haue been ouer-cowardly yeelded vp. We may therefore doe better, to giue credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no lesse then eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were only such as the Enemie spared, when the furie of Execution was past: but to these must be added about fiue thousand more, who yeelded in the greater campe, when their companie were either slaine or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romanes, especially the consull Varro, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some foure thousand Gaules, fifteene hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not sensible, in the ioy of so great a victorie; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal aduised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Warre had presently beene at an end. But hee beleeued not so farre in his owne prosperitie; and was therefold told, That hee knew how to get, not how to vse, a victorie.

Of things following the battaile at Canna.

NOt without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, vnto whose honour they consecrated their trauailes, than the truth of things, and information of posteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites, and Fathers conscript. No man of sound iudgement will condemne this libertie of censure, which Polybius hath vsed. For, to recompence his iunioritie, (such as it was) he produceth substantiall arguments, to iustifie his owne Relation; and confuteth the vanitie of those former Authors, out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill co-hering: which paines it is to be suspected, that he would not haue taken, had hee beene borne in either of these two Cities, but haue spared some part of his diligence, and beene contented, to haue all men thinke better and more honourably than it deserued, of his owne Countrie. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others; and shall haue some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat lesse Roman, or else, that some Workes of their opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both sides speake: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But since this cannot bee, wee must bee sometimes bold, to obserue the coherence of things; and beleeue so much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reason, or (at least) faire probabilitie. This attentiue circumspection is needfull at the present: such is the repugnancie, or forgetfulnesse, which we finde in the best Narration, of things following the Battaile of Canna. For it is said, that foure thousand foot and horse gathered together about the Consul Terentius at Venusia; that others to the number of ten thousand got into Cannusium, chosing for their Captaines, yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Consull Terentius Varro, ioyning his company vnto those of Scipio at Cannusium, wrote vnto the Senate, that he had now well-neere tenne thousand men about him; that these letters of the Consull were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly risen, that had beene taking order for pacifying those tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the first bruit of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embassadours from Capua (after some consultation, whether it were meet to send any, or, without further circumstance, to side with Hannibal) were sent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a prettie while before he wrote those letters, which ouer-tooke (in a maner) at Rome the first newes of the

ouerthrow. Among such incoherences, I hold it the best way, to omit so much as hath not some particular connexion with matter ensuing: mutuall dependencie in things of this nature, being no small argument of truth.

When Hannibal had sacked the Roman campe, and trussed vp the spoiles, forthwith he dislodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a disposition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forsake the Roman partie, and make alliande with Carthage. The first Towne that opened the gates vnto him, was Cossa, where hee laid vp his baggage: and leauing his brother Mago to take in other places, He hasted into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not onely in regard of their grieuous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romanes themselues, who could not hinder him from spoyling the Countrie, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly endure; but in a louing respect vnto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he vsed, vnto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victorie at Canna, He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so obstinate, against him that had sought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared he to win their loue by gifts; pretending to admire their valour; but seeking indeed, by all waies and meanes, to make them his, whilest all other motiues were concurrent. At this time also hee began to deale kindely (though against his nature) with the Roman prisoners; telling them, that hee bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being prouoked by iniuries, sought to right himselfe and his Countrie; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soueraigne Rule, not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gaue them leaue to choose ten of their number, that should bee sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ransome: and together with these, hee sent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to feele the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersitie, and could stoope vnto desire of peace. But with the Romanes these arts preuailed not, as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italie, all, or most of them, saue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not onely wearie of their losses past, but entertained a deceiueable hope, of changing their olde Societie for a better. Wherefore not onely the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not vntill the former generation vtterly subdued, began to re-assume their wonted spirits; but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the state of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as streightly conioyned, as were any saue the Latines, changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Prouince of Italie, if not (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the Citie of Capua, answerable vnto the Country, whereof it was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse conuenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the least requisite vnto soueraigne command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselues like Iayes by their feathers, despised the vnfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the Maiestie of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Innouation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so preuailed within Capua, that all was gouerned by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calauius an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held by furthering all popular desires: whereof, the coniunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offred their Citie to the Carthaginians, shortlie after the battaile of Thrasymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his iournie into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting vpon him. At that time, either the neerenesse of the Romane Armie, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actuall rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacie: or had leisure serued, yet were the multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vsage, and free dismissing, of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any such negotiation, without aduice of the Senate; which mainely impugned it. So they that had promised to yeeld vp their town to Hannibal, & meet him on the way, with some of their nobility that should assure him him of all faithfull meaning; were driuen to ſit ſtill, in a great perplexitie: as hauing failed to let in this their new friend, yet ſufficiently diſcouered themſelues, to draw vpon them the hatred of the Romans. In this caſe were no ſmall number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incenſed againſt their Senate; on whom they caſt all the blame, eaſily pardoning their owne cowardize. The people holding ſo tender a regard of libertie, that euen the lawfull Gouernment of Magiſtrates grieued them, with an imaginary oppreſſion; had now good cauſe to feare leſt the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by helpe of the Romans, bring them vnder a more ſtreight ſubiection, than euer they had endured. This feare, being ready to breake into ſome outrage, Pacuvius made vſe of, to ſerue his owne ambition. He diſcourſed vnto the Senate, as they ſate in Councell, about theſe motions troubling the Citie: and ſaid, That he himſelfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and giuen his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forſaking the Roman partie was not now the greateſt: for that the People were violently bent to murder all the Senate, and after to ioyne themſelues with Hannibal; who ſhould countenance the fact, and ſaue them harmeleſſe. This hee ſpake, as a man well knowne to be beloued himſelfe by the People, and priuie vnto their deſignes. Hauing throughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: Hee promiſed neuertheleſſe to deliuer them all, and to ſet things in quiet, if they would freelie put themſelues into his hands; offering his oath, or any other aſſurance that they ſhould demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then ſhutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor iſſue forth, without his leaue; He called the people to aſſembly: and ſpeaking as much ill of the Senate, as hee knew they would be glad to heare, hee told them, that theſe wicked Gouernours were ſurpriſed by his policie, and all faſt, ready to abide what ſentence they would lay vpon them. Onely thus much he aduiſed them, as a thing which neceſſity required, That they ſhould chooſe a new Senate, before they ſatisfied their anger vpon the olde. So rehearſing vnto them the names of one or two Senators, he asked what their iudgement was of thoſe. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Chooſe then (ſaid he) firſt of all ſome new ones into their places. Heereat the Multitude, vnprouided for ſuch an election, was ſilent; vntill at laſt, ſome one or other aduentured to name whom hee thought fit. The men ſo nominated, were vtterly diſliked by the whole Aſſembly; either for ſome known fault, baſeneſſe, and inſufficiencie; or elſe euen becauſe they were vnknown, and therefore held vnworthy. This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whileſt more were to be choſen; (the fitteſt men to be ſubſtituted, hauing beene named among the firſt, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius entreated, and eaſily preuailed with the people, that the preſent Senate might for this time bee ſpared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtleſſe) they would make, hauing thus obtained pardon of all offences paſt. Henceforth, not onely the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and eſteemed him their Patron; but the Senators alſo were gouerned by him, to whom they acknowledged themſelues indebted, for ſauing all their liues. Neither did the Senate faile after this by all obſequiouſneſſe, to court the People; giuing the reines vnto their lawleſſe Wil, who elſe were likely to caſt them down. All the City being thus of one minde; onely feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaile at Canna, this impediment was remooued: and few there were, that would open their mouthes to ſpeake againſt the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principall Gentlemen of the Campani, did then ſerue the Romanes in the Iſle of Sicil: the Parents and Kinſmen of theſe preuailed ſo far, that Embaſſadors were ſent vnto Terentius the Conſul; to ſee his preſent eaſe, and what it could miniſter of Hope or Feare. Theſe, whereſoeuer they found him, found him weakely attended, and as weake in ſpirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the ſeruice of their State; and deſired to know what he would command them. But he moſt baſely lamented vnto them the greatneſſe of the Romane misfortune: ſaying, that all was loſt; and that the Campani muſt now, now helpe the Romanes, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themſelues, but, make warre in their defence againſt the Carthaginians; as the Romanes had ſometimes done for the Campanes againſt the Samnites. Heereunto he is ſaid to haue added a fooliſh Inuective againſt Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of ſlaughtered carkaſes, and to feed vpon mans fleſh; with ſuch other ſtuffe, as onely bewrayed his owne feare. As for the Campani themſelues,

He

He put them in minde of their present strength: they hauing thirty thousand foot, and some thousand horse, with monie, and all prouisions, in aboundance. Thus hee dismissed them, prouder then they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship, whereas before, they were somewhat timerous, in aduenturing to seeke their owne libertie. Hauing reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made alliance, vpon these conditions; That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their owne Lawes; That no Citizens of their should be subiect vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soeuer, whether in War or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campans three hundred Romane prisoners, such as themselues would choose, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicil.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius an honourable Citizen opposed himselfe earnestly: vsing, in vaine, many perswasions, to the wilfull and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change olde friends for new acquaintance. This did hee, when they were sending Embassadors vnto Hannibal: and this also did hee, when the new Alliance was concluded; but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entring the Towne: at which time hee gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it and to cut it in pieces, that by such a notable piece of seruice, they might make amends vnto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Aduertisement hereof was giuen to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleaging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subiection vnto any Carthaginian; and therfore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hasted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples; which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado, but found the wals too high, & was not well prouided to lay siege vnto it. At Capua he was entertained with great solemnitie and pompe: all the people issuing forth of the Towne, to behold that great Commander, which had wonne so many noble victories. Hauing taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly Citie, and passed ouer his first Entertainments; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italie and Rome it selfe, should be driuen to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receiue Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly tooke part with the Romanes their enemies; He prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campan, but a Traitor to the State: and vse him accordingly, giuing sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserued. This was granted: and Magius deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first comming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if he kept him aliue, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal setled his friendship with the Campans: among whom, onely this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being assisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuuius. This Perolla would haue murdered Hannibal, whilest he was at supper, the first night of his comming; had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any such attempt. All the Towne (besides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are said to haue murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to haue smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, tanne some other Townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citie. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casilinc, and Acerra, were the Cities next adioyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakely manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romanes at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Townes; but were faine to leaue all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreame feare of Hannibals comming, at the first report of the ouerthrow at Canna: and the griefe of that losse was so generall, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the prouision against apparant danger. It was hard to iudge, whether the losse alreadie receiued, or the feare of destruction presently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to stint the noyse and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Courriers were sent sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went: whereof when Letters from the Consull Varro had throughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ranne into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatall bookes, buried aline two men and women Gaules and Greekes, in their Ox-market. If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them such instructions; we may iustly thinke, that Sibyl her selfe was instructed by the Diuell. Yet is it not improbable, that extremity of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Sooth-saiers, whose detestable counsels they afterwards, for their own honor, (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the books of Sibyl. An Embassadour was sent to Delphi, to consult with the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire with what prayers & supplications they might pacifie the gods, & obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discouer their great feare; though not seruing to giue remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor Otacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if hee found it meet, to passe ouer into Africk. In these were contained newes, of one Carthaginian Fleet, that wasted the Kingdome of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Iles Ægates, which was in readines to set vpon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman Prouince, if the Præror stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the middest of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take soueraigne charge of the Weale publique, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seeme strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giuing him thankes for that he had not despaired of the Weale publique. But this was done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtlesse) prouided wisely, for vpholding the generall reputation. If his comming into the Citie, had renewed the lamentations and out-cries of the people: what else would haue followed, than a contempt of their wretchednes, among those that were subiect vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their welcome, and thankes; they noysed abroad a fame, which came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seeme grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done. But whereas Liuie would haue vs thinke, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleeue him not. It was done fearefully, and to couer their griefe: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would haue strucke off his head; as in few yeres after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Iunius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised foure new Legions, and a 1000. horse: though with much difficulty; as being fain to take vp some, that were very Boyes. These foure Legions are elswhere forgotten, in accompt of the forces leuied by this Dictator; and two Legions onely set downe, that had bin enrolled in the beginning of the yere for custodie of the Citie. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field, foure new ones of Prætextati, or striplings, were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, & so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them 8000. sturdy slaues, that were put in hope of liberty, if they should deserue it by manfull seruice. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed, That whosoeuer owght mony and could not pay it, or had committed any capitall offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serue in the war. To arme these Cõpanies, they were fain to take down, out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had bin there set vp: among which, were 6000. Armors of the Gaules, that had bin carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were faine to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canne, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilest he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captiues, audience was giuen by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be ransomed at the publike charge; not onely the teares & lamentation of their poore kinsfolke, but the great need, wherin the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their ſute; which yet they obtained not. Beſides the generall cuſtome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and ſtrengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was ouerthrowne, and taken priſoner in the former Warre) not to be too tender of ſuch as had yeelded to the enemy; much was alledged againſt theſe who now craued ranſome: but the ſpeciall point was, that they were wilfully loſt, ſince they might haue ſaued themſelues, as others did. It ſufficed not vnto theſe poore men, to ſay, that their offence was no greater than the Conſuls; they were told, that this was great preſumption. The truth was, the State wanted money: and therefore could not want excuſes, whereby to auoid the diſburſement: whether it were ſo, or not, that any ſuch Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither muſt wee regard it, that the ſlaues which were armed for the warre, are ſaid to haue coſt more, than the ſumme did amount vnto, that would haue ranſomed theſe priſoners. For this is but a tale, deuiſed to countenance the Roman proceedings as if they had beene ſeuere; when as indeed they were ſutable to the preſent fortune, poore, and ſomewhat beggerly. Hereof it is no little proofe, That Hannibal valued thoſe Roman ſlaues, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Maſters, at no more, than euery one the third part of a common Souldiers ranſome: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat hee thought them current. But if we ſhould ſuppoſe, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargaine for ſlaues might haue beene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with priuate men; yet muſt we withall conſider, that theſe priuate men did onely lend theſe ſlaues for a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbeare the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchiſed) vntill the War ſhould be ended. If Hannibal would haue giuen ſuch long day of payment; it is likely that the Romans would haue beene his Chapmen: but ſeeing he dealt onely for ready money, they choſe rather to ſay, We will not giue, than, We cannot. The like auſteritie, vpon the ſame reaſon, but contrary pretence, was vſed toward the ſouldiers that eſcaped from that great Battaile. Theſe were charged for hauing fled: as the priſoners were, for not flying, when they might haue done ſo. True it is, that in ſuch caſes (if euer) that which they call raggione del Stato may ſerue for an excuſe: when the Common-wealth being driuen to a miſerable exigent, is faine to helpe it ſelfe, by doing iniuries to priuate men. And ſo dealt the Romans now: condemning all thoſe that had ſerued at Canna, to be tranſported into Sicil; and there to ſerue, not as others did, vntill they had fulfilled twenty yeeres in the Warres, or elſe were fifty yeeres of age; but vntill this Warre ſhould be ended, how long ſoeuer it laſted, and that without reward. The ſame thrifty cenſure, was afterwards laide vpon others, for their misbehauiour: but neuer vpon any man of quality, ſaue only (a good while after this, at better leiſure) vpon Cæcilius Metellus, and a few other hare-braind fooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wittes, with the terrour of ſo great a loſſe, were deuiſing, after the battaile, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet had ſcarce one Towne within it. The inequality of this rigour grew ſhortly diſtaſtfull to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People; neuertheleſſe it was quietly digeſted, the excuſe being no leſſe apparent then the fault.

Liu. lib. 25.

M. Iunius the Dictator, hauing diſpatched all needfull buſineſſe within the Citie, tooke the field with fiue and twenty thouſand men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot find: nor more of him than this, That he ſpent the time about Campania; where (as may be preſumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be aſcribed, that Hannibal did no greater euill: for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weake eſtate, onely Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Oſtia with a Fleet, ready to ſet ſaile for Sicil, hauing one Legion aboord his ſhips, and fifteene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces hee was to defend that Iland, and doe what harme he could in Africk. But hearing of the ouerthrow at Canna, hee ſent theſe of his new Leuy to Rome, for defence of the Citie, and marched haſtily with his Legion toward Cannuſium: deliuering the Fleete, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magiſtrates, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the reſt of the Campanes) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to auoid this otherwiſe, than by ſeeming to deliberat about the articles of this new Confederacy. Wherefore hee made great iournies thitherward; and arriued euen time enough enough to preuent the Enemy. Many idle walkes Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples: aſſaying by faire words, and terrible threats, the one and the other Citie. Naples was ſtrong, and not infected with any the leaſt touch of diſloyalty: had alſo a ſure Hauen; whereby it ſtood in the leſſe feare, of ſuſtaining much inconuenience, by ſpoile of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrie. But at Nola it was thought a valuable conſideration, That Hannibal was Maſter of the field: which if he laid waſte, all the poore people were vtterly vndone. So thought the Multitude: and ſuch talke vſed ſome, that had little feare of their own priuate want or pouerty, but a great deſire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of theſe, one L. Bantius was chiefe; a ſtout yong Gentleman, and Souldier of eſpeciall marke, well beloued in the Citie, and one that had done good ſeruice to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, halfe dead at Cannæ, and after much gentle vſage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly diſmiſſed with liberall gifts. Hee therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greateſt thankes hee could vnto ſo courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiuing this, wrought vpon the ſame eaſie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had beene by chance, ſeemed to wonder, why one that had ſo well deſerued of the Roman ſtate, had not repaired vnto him the Prætor, who deſired nothing more than ſuch acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifs, and louing entertainment, being himſelfe alſo a man highly reputed for his perſonall valour, he made this Bantius ſo farre in loue with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, againſt the Romans, whereof he had not preſently aduertiſement. At the comming of Marcellus, Hannibal remoued from about Nola; and aſſayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garriſon; vpon confidence whereof they gaue him a peremptorie anſwere, to his diſcontent. Thence went he to Nuceria: which he tooke by compoſition; and ſo returned backe againe to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore vnto him: who although they durſt not ſtirre in his quarrell, being ouer-awed by the Roman Garriſon; yet if they ſaw Marcellus hardly beſtead, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies aſſayling him without, like enough it ſeemed, that they would not be wanting vnto the accompliſhment of their owne deſires. He therefore brought his Army cloſe to the Towne, and skirmiſhed often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to doe much good, but onely to make ſhew of a meaning to force the Towne; which he ſought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night-time there paſſed meſſages betweene him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne ſhould preſently riſe; and ſeizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was aduertiſed: and fearing, leſt the Conſpirators would ſhortly aduenture, euen to find him buſied within the Citie, whileſt the Carthaginians ſhould ſcale the walles; hee thought it the ſureſt way, to cut off the enemies hope, and ſend him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three ſeuerall gates looking towards the enemy: He gaue a ſtreight command, that all the Citizens ſhould keepe their houſes. Thus hee lay cloſe a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; againſt whom he had cuſtomarily iſſued forth before more early, euery day, to skirmiſh. But when it was further noted, that the walles were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that ſurely all was diſcouered, and Marcellus now buſied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bade his men bring ladders, and make ready for the aſſault: which was done in all haſte. But when the Carthaginians were at the very wals; and thought nothing leſſe, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: ſuddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the beſt and oldeſt of his Souldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noiſe, to make his vnexpected ſally the more more terrible. Whileſt the Carthaginians, much out of order, were ſome of them flying before Marcellus, the reſt making head againſt him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like ſort iſſued they of the new leuied Companies, vpon the enemies backes. The ſudden terror was more auaileable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was ſo great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the braueſt Actes performed in all that Warre; foraſmuch as hereby it was firſt prooued, that Hannibal might be ouercome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a ſtrict accompt of the Citizens of Nola: condemning aboue threescore and ten of high Treason, whose heads he strucke off; and so leauing the Town in quiet obedience vnto their Senate, went & encamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the meane season was gone to Acerra: where being excluded, he thought it no wisedome to lose time in perswasions, but laide siege vnto it, and began on all sides to close it vp. This terrified the People, who knew themselues vnable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finished, and they quite surrounded; they stole out by night, and left him the Towne empty: which he sacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal: as being vnwilling that an Enemy so neere should disquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. It seemes, or rather indeed it is plaine, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Army seeke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the ioy of his Enemies, vpon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slaine in plaine battaile, but by a sudden eruption; witnesseth chiefly, in what great feare they stood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were: that hauing three yeeres since demanded at Carthage, the body of Hannibal, to be deliuered vnto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselues, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmish not farre from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not resistlesse. At Casilinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Towne, and held it. Fiue hundred of the Prænestines there were, and aboue foure hundred of Perusia, with some of the Latines. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the Battaile at Cannæ, being sent by their seuerall States to the Campe: whither whilest they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountred them, and sent them backe sorrowfull; for they loued well their Lords the Romans, vnder whose gouernment they liued happily. So came they all, one after another to Casiline, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard newes from Capua, How that great Citie became the Ring-leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore sought how to rid their hands of those Prænestines and their fellowes; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laide one for another, at last they slew all the Townesmen in a night, and fortified the Westerne part of the Towne (for it was diuided by the Riuer Vulturnus) against the Enemy. If they had runne away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casiline were as the rest of the Campanes, all Traitors; they themselues might haue beene reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancy in defence of the place witnesseth, vpon what honest reasons they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to haue encountred with greater forces: but these few found him more worke then hee expected. Diuers assaults hee gaue, but was still repelled with losse: and many sallies they made, with variable euent. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driuen to close them vp, and seeke to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the horse, lay with the Roman Army higher vp the Riuer: who faine would haue relieued Casiline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had giuen him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopped by the ouerflowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leaue them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water stayed his iourney, such entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like, that the Dictator tarryed at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Casiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was lost, because the Romans durst not aduenture to raise the siege. Barrels of corne were sent by night, floting down the Riuer; and when some of these, being carryed awry by an Eddie of the water, stucke among the Willowes on the banke, whereby this mannner of reliefe was discouered and preuented; Gracchus cast a great quantitie of Nuts into the streame, which faintly sustained the poore besieged men. At length when all foode was spent, and whatsoeuer grew greene vnder the Walles was gathered for Sallets; the Carthaginians ploughed vp the ground: whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and saide, That he meant not to stay at Casiline, vntill the Rapes were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto he had refused to hearken vnto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by puniſhing their obſtinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their liues at an indifferent ranſom, which when they had paid, he quietly diſmiſſed them according to his promiſe. Seuen hundred Carthaginians he placed in Caſiline, as a Garriſon for defence of the Campanes; vnto whom he reſtored it. To the Praneſtine Souldiers great thankes were giuen, and louing rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their preſent condition pleaſed them ſo well, that they choſe rather to continue, as they were, in Praneſte; which is no weake proofe, of the good eſtate wherein the Cities flouriſhed, that were ſubiect to the Roman Gouernment. This ſiege of Caſiline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as hauing long detained Hannibal, and conſumed much of his time, that might otherwiſe haue beene better ſpent. For Winter ouer-tooke him, long before hee could diſpatch the buſineſſe: which how to quit with his honour hee knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where hee refreſhed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Hiſtorians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as ſhall appeare hereafter.

Of the great ſupply that was decreed at Carthage to be ſent to Hannibal into Italie. How by the malice of Hanno, and ſloth or parſimony of the Carthaginians, the ſupply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faſter, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Hiſtorians, how partiall they were in their writings.

WHen Mago, the ſonne of Amilcar, had ſpent ſome time about the taking in of ſuch Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Canne; his brother Hannibal ſent for him to Capua, and thence diſpatched him away to Carthage, with the ioyfull meſſage of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Conſuls he had chaced, wounded, or ſlain; how the ſtout Romans, that in the former warre neuer ſhunned any occaſion of fight, were now growne ſo calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the onely good Captaine, becauſe he neuer durſt aduenture to come to battaile; That, not without reaſon, their ſpirits were thus abated, ſince Hannibal had ſlaine of them aboue two hundred thouſand, and taken aboue fifty thouſand priſoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that following the fortune of thoſe great victories, had reuolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among the reſt hee magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not onely (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe ſeate of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how louingly his brother had bin entertained, where he meant to reſt that winter, attending their ſupply. As for the warre, Hee ſaid it was euen at an end, if they would now purſue it cloſely, and not giue the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themſelues, and repaire their broken forces. He willed them to conſider, that the war was farre from home, in the Enemies Countrey; that ſo many battailes had much diminiſhed his brothers Armie: that the Souldiers, who had ſo well deſerued, ought to be conſidered with liberall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of mony, corne, and other neceſſaries; but that theſe things muſt be ſent from Carthage: which the victory would requite with large amends. Finally hee cauſed the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were ſlaine, to be powred out openly in the Court: which being meaſured, filled (as ſome ſay) three buſhels, or (as others would rather haue it) no more then one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatneſſe of the Roman calamity, for as much as none but the * principall of that Order, were accuſtomed to weare that ornament.

Who ſo conſiders the former Punicke Warre, may eaſily finde, that the State of Carthage neuer did receiue, in all the durance therof, any ſuch hopefull aduertiſements from their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no marueile, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemency of this ioy, Himilco, a Senator aduerſe to the faction of Hanno, is ſaid to haue demanded of that great perſwader vnto peace with Rome, Whether

* Thus Liuie reports it: and credible it is, that while Rome was poore, the bravery of priuate men was not altogether ſo great, as the Law would haue permitted; though otherwiſe Ius Annuli, The wearing of the Ring, was the generall priuiledge of the Roman Equites.

Whether he were ſtill of opinion, that Hannibal ſhould be yeelded vp vnto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to giue thanks vnto the gods, for this their good ſucceſſe. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the ſame formall anſwer, which Liuie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conſcripti, by a terme proper to the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne ſhamefull ouerthrow receiued at the Ilands Ægatei: yet the ſumme of his ſpeech appeares to haue been no leſſe malicious, than it is ſet downe, foraſmuch as Hannibal himſelfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed againſt the wickednesſe of this Hanno; ſaying, that his hatred againſt the Barchines, had oppreſſed their Familie, when otherwiſe it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made ſuch a ieſt of theſe victories, as is reported; ſaying, It ill beſeemed him, who had vanquiſhed the Romans, to call for more helpe, as if he had been beaten; or him, that had taken their campe, filled forſooth with ſpoyle, to make requeſt for meate and money. To theſe cauils, if anſwer were needfull, it might be ſaid, That other booty than of horſes and ſlaues, little was to be found in the Roman campe: the beſt of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few [a] ſiluer ſtuds in the bridles and trappings of their horſes. If Hannibal had taken any maine conuoy of money and prouiſions, going to ſupply all wants of a great Army in ſome other Prouince, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards ſaid to haue done, when they wanne the campe of Aſdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spaine, in his iourney towards Italy) then might ſuch an obiection more iuſtly haue been made vnto his demaund of a ſupply. But the moſt likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein he beſt might hope to preuaile, contained a perſwaſion to vſe their fortune with moderation; and now to ſeeke peace, whileſt they had ſo much the better in warre.

What would haue been the iſſue of this counſaile, if it had been followed, it were not eaſie to ſay. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would haue brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely that the faith, ſo often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would haue bin kept entire, when any opinion of good aduantage had called for reuenge of ſo many ſhameful ouerthrowes; ſince after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no ſubmiſſiue behauiour could preſerue Carthage from ruine, longer than vntill ſuch time, as Rome was at leiſure from all other warres. This Counſaile therefore of Hanno, though it might ſeeme temperate, was indeed very peſtilent; and ſerued onely to hinder the performance of a noble reſolution. For it was concluded by a maine conſent of the Senate, that forty thouſand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of ſiluer, ſhould be ſent ouer to Hannibal: and that, beſides theſe, twenty thouſand foot, and foure thouſand horſe, ſhould bee leuied in Spaine; not onely to ſupply, as need ſhould require, the Armies in that Prouince, but to be tranſported into Italy.

This great aide, had it beene as carefully ſent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Hiſtorians would not haue found cauſe, to taxe the rechleſſe improuidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Canna to Rome, or in refreſhing his Army among the delights of Capua: the next yeeres worke would haue finiſhed the buſineſſe, with leſſe dangerous aduenture; and the pleaſures, which his men enioyed among the Campanes, would haue been commended, as rewards by him well thought vpon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be imployed in the following Warre. But either the too much careleſneſſe of thoſe, that were loth to make haſte in laying out their money, before extreame neceſſity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellowes, working vpon the priuate humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commodity, than ſenſe of the publike neede; vtterly peruerted, and made vnprofitable in the performance, the order that had beene ſo well ſet downe. The [b] Elephants were ſent: and ſome money peraduenture; vncertaine it is, how long after. But thoſe great forces of threeſcore thouſand foote, and foure thouſand horſe, came not into Italy, till much was loſt of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was firſt conſumed by time, and ſundry accidents of warre. Onely ſome ſmall numbers, no way anſwering vnto the proportion decreed, were ſent into Spaine; and the iourney of Aſdrubal thence through France into Italie much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many yeeres were paſt, and the Romans had recouered their ſtrength.

Heere we may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie, both by

by the Tributes receiued from their ſubiects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, ſince the Warre of the Mercenaries; and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greateſt neceſſitie twelue hundred talents; had exceedingly impoueriſhed Carthage: which was before brought into great want, euen by the expence of ſo much money, as was to be diſburſed for redeeming of peace, after the loſſe at Ægateis. Yet wee ſee, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, beſides thoſe already on foote, are appointed to the ſeruice in Italy, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of money in theſe chargeable vndertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other ſide, hauing three or foure yeeres together beene forced to ſome extraordinary coſt, are faine to goe vpon credit, euen for the price of thoſe ſlaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such aduantage, in meanes to enrich their Treaſury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterran Sea, euen from Tyrus their Mother-Citie in the bottome of the ſtreights vnto the great Ocean, aboue the Romans: who liued on the fruites of their ground; and receiued their Tributes from people following the ſame courſe of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leiſure to ſhew it ſelfe, in the deſtruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman falſhood, in ſeeking an honeſt colour wherewith to ſhadow the intended breach of faith, diſcouered plainely whence the iealouſie was bred, that this mighty City would againe rebell, For the Carthaginians, hauing giuen vp hoſtages, euen before the Roman Army did ſet forth, to performe whatſoeuer ſhould be enioyned them, with condition that their City might not bee deſtroyed; and hauing accordingly, when they were ſo required, yeelded vp all their weapons, and engines of Warre; the Romans told them plainely, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, ſhould be friendly dealt withall, but the Towne muſt needes be demoliſhed, and remoued into ſome other place, that ſhould bee twelue miles diſtant from the Sea. For (ſaide the Romans) this Trade of Merchandize, by which yee now liue, is not ſo fit for peaceable men, ſuch as yee promiſe to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholeſome kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conuerſation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though ſugred with gloſing words, plainely ſhewes, what good obſeruation the elder Cato had made of the haſty growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demaunded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatſoeuer it were, he added ſtill this concluſion, Thus I thinke; and that Carthage ſhould be deſtroyed; Hee may ſeeme, not onely to haue had regard vnto that preſent wealth, which at his being there hee had found in the City, but much more vnto theſe times, and the great height whereunto it roſe, euen ſuddenly as we ſee, out of many calamities, whileſt the Romans thought, that it had not been in caſe to dare ſo terrible a Warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more induſtrious and skilfull than the Romans; ſo came they farre ſhort of them, in the honourable care of the publike good: hauing euery one, or moſt of them, a more principall regard of his owne priuate benefit. This made them (beſides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the firſt heate of their affection, wherein they concluded to purſue the warre ſtrongly, was ouer-paſt, goe more leiſurely to worke, than had been requiſite in the execution. It was eaſie for Hanno to perſwade couetous men, that they ſhould firſt of all defend their owne in Spaine. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Prouince was ſecured, they might ſend an Army into Italie; ſo going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wiſdome, to commit all the ſtrength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, againſt the enemies; or (which perhaps were worſe) to the Gouernment of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who hauing once (if they could ſo do) finiſhed the warre, might eaſily make * Hannibal a King, and ſubdue Carthage, with the forces that he had giuen them to the conqueſt of Rome.

By ſuch malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne ſlackneſſe, incredulity, dulnes, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perſwaded rather to make ſmal diſburſements in Spain, than to ſet vp all their reſt at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impoſſible, to hold a Countrey of ſo large extent, and ſo open a coaſt as that of Spaine, free from all incurſion of the Enemy: eſpecially the affection of the Naturalls being (as in a new Conqueſt) ill eſtabliſhed. A better way therefore it had beene to make a running Warre; by which

which the Romans might haue beene found occupied, euen with the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their maine intendment against Rome it selfe, vntill such time as euery little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Prouince, then must Emporiæ haue been besieged and forced: which by reason of alliance with the Massilians, gaue vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the towne of Emporiæ was too strong to be wonne in haste: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians; hauing not aboue foure hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Græcians, though not ouer-much trusted. Wherfore to force this towne of Emporia, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Massilians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would haue beene a worke of little lesse difficulty, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Cannæ: yea it had beene in effect none other, than to alter the seate of the warre; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better iudgement, neere vnto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to bee forborne; great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans vtterly out of Spaine: whom they might more easily haue diuerted thence, and drawne home to their owne doores, by making strong warre vpon their Citie. For euen so the Romans afterwards remooued Hannibal into Africk, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeuoured to change the seate of the warre, transferring it out of Italie into Spaine. But the priuate affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accessary to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken vnto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane while they suffered Hannibal, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselues in trauaile for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakely assisted; as if the industry of these Barchines had bin somwhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in generall, were farre lesse honourable than the people of Rome: not onely in gouernment of their subiect Prouinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike aboue their priuate interest. But as they thriued little in the end, by their parsimony vsed toward their owne Mercenaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this warre present, will make them complaine, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victory at Cannæ; when gladly they would giue all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfuls into Spaine.

That both the Spanish businesse, and the state of Africk it selfe, depended wholly, or for the most part, vpon successe of things in Italie; the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Gouernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though wee must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Liuie, the tender loue of his owne Countrey, which made him giue credit vnto Fabius and others: yet must we not, for his sake, beleeue those lies, which the vnpartiall iudgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gaue them originalll. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former warre, That hauing cleane spent their strength, and being euen broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselues vnto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the life of Amilcar, set downe by Æmilius Probus, That Eryx was in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not been any warre. These words, being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouer liberall. For in the treaty of peace betweene Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes, and forsake Sicil, threatning, that otherwise hee would not talke of any composition:

Pol. lib. 1.

Amilcar

Amilcar boldly bad him chuſe, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the Armes, which his Countrey had put into his hands to vſe againſt her Enemies, it was not his purpoſe to yeeld vp vnto them. Now ſince the Romans, contrary to their cuſtome vpon like aduantages, were content to let Amilcar haue his will, and not to ſtand with him vpon point of honour, whileſt otherwiſe they might quietly rid their hands of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man conſumed with miſeries, as Fabius would haue him ſeeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntruth: ſaying, that howſoeuer Amilcar, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremitie, yet they behaued themſelues as men that had no ſenſe thereof; and were as farre from being either vanquiſhed, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference betweene Fabius (as alſo perhaps betweene other old Writers of the Roman ſtorie) and thoſe that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty Citie of Rome: we muſt take it in good part, that howſoeuer Liuie introduceth Hanno, in one place, ioyning very fooliſhly his owne ſhamefull ouerthrow at the Ilands, [a] Ægateis, with the great ſeruices of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of thē had had a like euent; yet [a] elſewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappy conduct) into the ſame Hanno his mouth, making him ſay, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the loſſe of their Fleet in that battaile at Sea: wherein himſelfe was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, there is cauſe to wiſh, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like ſtampe, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Liuie to his Rome, had not cauſed him to thinke too well of their relations: which are ſuch as follow.

§. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before Aſdrubal the ſonne of Amilcar followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italie.

IT hath bin ſhewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Conſul, returning from Gaule into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his deſcent from the Alpes, ſent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spaine. Two Roman Legions, with foureteene thouſand foot of the Confederates, and twelue hundred horſe, had been alotted vnto the Conſul, therewith to make warre in Spaine againſt Hannibal: who ſince he was marching into Italie with the ſtrength of his Army, P. Scipio beleeued, that a good part of theſe his owne forces might well be ſpared from the Spaniſh Expedition; and therefore made bold to carry ſome of the number backe with him, ſending on his brother with the reſt, as his Lieutenant. Publius himſelfe remained in Italie all the time of his Conſulſhip; which being expired, He was ſent Proconſul into Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thouſand men, and a Fleete of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of theſe two Brethren in their Prouince, were very great; and, as they are reported, ſomewhat maruellous. For they continually preuailed in Spaine, againſt the Carthaginians: whom they vanquiſhed in ſo many battailes, and with-drew from their Alliance ſo many of the Spaniards their Confederates, that we haue cauſe to wonder, how the enemy could ſo often find meanes to repaire his forces, and returne ſtrong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might eaſily winne vnto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durſt aduenture to breake it: ſo the ancient reputation of the firſt Conquerors might ſerue to arme the Naturals againſt theſe Inuaders; and to reclaime thoſe, that had reuolted vnto the Romans, were it onely by the memory of ſuch ill ſucceſſe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may bee added the Carthaginian Treaſure: which eaſily raiſed Souldiers, among thoſe valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirſty Nations. Neither was it of ſmall importance, that ſo many of the Spaniards had their children, kinſmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Warres; or ſeruing the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if wee durſt be bold to ſay it; the victories of the Scipio's were neither ſo many, nor ſo great as they are ſet out by Liuie. This we may be bold to ſay, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Liuie in his perſon, maketh an obiection, vnto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Liuie for him, doth

Liu. lib. 28. doth answere, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spaine: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had beene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should inuade Italie. And it is indeede an incredible narration, That Asdrubal being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of battaile, saue onely by the steepe descent of Rockes, ouer a great Riuer that lay at his backe, ranne away with all his money, Elephants, and broken troups, ouer Tagus, directly towards the Pyrenees, and so toward Italy; vpon which he fell with more then threescore thousand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retrait, if hee should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemy: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so haue they said to haue done in the last battaile between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Campe. Wherefore we can no more then be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this Warre, and Spanish, (if there were any) being vtterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wisedome to giue too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily runne ouer the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine; not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporiæ, an Hauen towne, not farre within the Pyrenees, retaining still the same name with little inflection. That by the fame of his clemency, hee allured many Nations to become subiect vnto Rome, as the storie begins of him, I could easily beleeue, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had need to vse his clemency, or he to giue such famous example thereof, being a meere stranger, and hauing no iurisdiction in the Country. Yet is it certaine, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himselfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better successe, for that he seemed to haue none other errand, than setting them at liberty. This pretext availed with some: others were to be hired with money: and some he compelled to yeeld by force or feare; especially, when hee had wonne a battaile against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that he remembred to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances neuer forgate, vnlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Maiestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conseruent, which is, as Tullie interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) vphold the Maiestie of the people of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implyed it indeed an obscure couenant of subiection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became ditionis Romanæ; of the Romane iurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Countrey wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargutians; Hannibal had found, at his comming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore hee not onely appointed Hanno Gouernour ouer them, as ouer the rest of the Prouince betweene Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke hee gaue the Principality of their Country vnto Hanno and his Heires,) Hee made him not onely Lieutenant generall ouer them, in matters of Warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferiour Officers of their owne, leauing them to be gouerned by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the comming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselues indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times proue worse then the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanois, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turnes of the Spaniards, and French; as more sensible still of the present euill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ranne by seeking to auoide it. This bad affection of his Prouince, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: besides which it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Prouince. Therefore he aduentured a battaile with Scipio; wherein hee was ouerthrowne and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stissum, a Towne hard by, and wonne

it. But Asdrubal hauing passed Iberus, and comming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found carelesse, as after a victory, rouing abroad in the Countrey; and with great slaughter draue them aboord their ships. This done, hee ranne vp into the Countrey, where he withdrew the Illergetes from the Roman partie, though they had giuen Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane season was gone to visit and aide his Fleete: where hauing set things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his comming, but withdrew himselfe againe ouer Iberus. So the Illergetes were compelled by force, hauing lost Athanagia their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Ausetani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirty dayes; hoping in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would haue made the Romans to dislodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of siluer. During the siege, the Lacetani came to helpe their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leauing twelue thousand of their Company dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should without any cause remembred, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, hauing lately become voluntarily ditionis Romanæ, subiect vnto Rome, should in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold Warre against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleeue, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, stirred vp the Illergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whilest himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saued himselfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio aduenturing too farre into the Countrey, was beaten by Asdrubal backe to his ships, whence he durst not stirre, vntill Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Prouince, leauing some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio wonne, by returning vpon them, vnlooked for, through a deepe snow. As for the Lacetani, Illergetes, and the rest, we may reasonably thinke, that they sought their owne benefit: helping themselues one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, vpon sense of iniuries receiued, or apprehension of more grieuous tyranny, vnder which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, harkening againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to liue vnder their owne Countrey Lawes, and not vnder Gouernours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: euen from hencefoorth vnto the dayes of Augustus Cæsar; till when they were neuer throughly conquered. Liu. lib. 21.

The yeere following this, Cn. Scipio had a victorie against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not two farre on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this victory, aboue one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Estates, in Spaine, are said to haue submitted themselues vnto the Romans, or giuen Hostages: whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flie into the vtmost corners of the land, and hide himselfe in Lucitania. Yet it followes; that the Illergetes did againe rebell; that Asdrubal hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though hauing easily vanquished the Illergetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred vp against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subiects, and had giuen him Hostages. These tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battailes; wherein they slue fifteene thousand of his men, and tooke foure thousand Prisoners. Then arriued P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and hencefoorward the two brethren ioyntly administred the businesse in Spaine.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian Warre; the two Scipio's did haud cunctanter, without both feare or doubt, passe ouer Iberus, and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and among many others, the same Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal.

Asdrubal. Bostar, the Gouernor of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himselfe to be perswaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the onely way to get the fauour and hearty good will of the Countrey, was by freely restoring vnto them their Hostages; as resting, without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generals: perswading them, as hee had done Bostar, to make the Liberality their owne. Hereby the Romans purchased much loue, if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we finde, that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearsing so many particularities, whereof I can beleeue so few. But since we find no better certainties, we must content our selues with these.

The yeere following was like vnto this: Asdrubal must be beaten againe. The two Scipio's diuide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hath gotten foure thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse, out of Africk: He repaires his Fleet; and prouides euery way to make resistance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, reuolt vnto the Romans: because they had been chidden the last yeere for their negligence, which had betrayed the Nauy. The reuolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spaine. These doe much mischiefe, so that Asdrubal is faine to make a iourney to them. His sudden comming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly assaile him, that they driue him, for very feare, to encampe himselfe strongly on an high peece of ground; whence hee dares not come foorth to giue them battaile. So they take a Towne by force, wherein he had laid vp all his prouisions; and shortly make themselues Masters of the Countrey round about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearely pay. Asdrubal comes vpon them, takes them vnprepared, beats them, kils the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage; that Asdrubal should leade his Army forth into Italy: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe, if they had beene informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had so weakly supplyed him, as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported: and that vpon the very rumour of this his iourney, almost all Spaine was ready to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so: or, if they will needs haue it so, that then they must send him a Successor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to imploy they should find worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much mooued with this excuse: Asdrubal must needes be gone; Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that seruice both by Land & Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spain. Wherfore Asdrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furnish himselfe with store of money, that he might haue wherewithall to winne the friendship of the Gauls; through whose Countries he must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly too blame, for not remembring to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he layes great Impositions vpon all the Spaniards his subiects: and hauing gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Riuers name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieue it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquished at home; than get the victorie, and afterwards he haled into Italy. Great numbers are slaine: and few should haue escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were fully ioyned. Their Campe the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (questionlesse) they are maruellously enriched; all the money that could be raked together in Spaine, being carried along in this Italian expedition. This dayes euent ioynes all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Countrey stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so far from all thought of trauelling into Italie, that it leaues him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spaine. Of these exploits aduertisement is sent to Rome: and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they haue neither money, apparrell, nor bread, wherewith to sustaine their Army and Fleet; That all is wanting: so as vnlesse they may be supplyed from

Liu. lib. 23.

Rome,

Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Prouince: Theſe Letters come to Rome in an euill ſeaſon; the State being ſcarcely able, after the loſſe at Canne, to helpe it ſelfe at home. Yet reliefe is ſent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that loue and care, which the priuate Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, ſhall be inſerted elſe-where, into the relation of things whereof the truth is leſſe queſtionable. At the comming of this ſupply, the two Scipio's purſue Aſdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What elſe can we thinke, that remember the laſt newes of him, and how fearefully he miſtruſted his owne ſafetie? They find him, and Mago, and Amilcar the ſonne of Bomilcar, with an Army of threeſcore thouſand men, beſieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, and others, probably coniecture to haue ſtood, where Carinnena is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgis, afterward called Forum Iulij, quite another way) a Towne of the Illergetes their neereſt Neighbours, for hauing reuolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly diſtreſſed; but moſt of all, for want of victualles. The Romans therefore breake through betweene the Enemies Campes, with terrible ſlaughter of all that reſiſt them: and hauing victualled the place, encourage the towneſ-men to defend their walls as ſtoutly, as they ſhould anon beholde them fighting manfully with the beſiegers, in their behalfe. So they iſſue forth, about ſixteene thouſand againſt three ſcore-thouſand: and killing more of the enemies, than themſelues were in number; driue all the three Carthaginian Commanders, euery one out of his quarter; and tooke that day, beſides priſoners and other bootie, fiftie and eight Enſignes. Liu. lib. 23.

The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall vpon Intibili, that ſtood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning mony by warre, for thus re-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: ſince Aſdrubal was lately driuen to poll the Countrey, wanting money of his owne; and being beaten in this iourny, had loſt his wealthy carriages, when his Campe was taken after the battel by Ibera. Howſoeuer it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their cuſtome) are beaten againe at Incibili: where there were of them aboue thirteene thouſand ſlaine, and aboue three thouſand taken; beſides two and forty Enſignes, and nine Elephants. Liu. lib. 23. After this, (in a maner) all the people of Spaine fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antias, or ſome other Hiſtorian, to whom Liuy gaue credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeare, by winning famous victories; whereof theſe good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithſtanding this large acceſſe of Dominion, winter on their owne ſide of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spaniards riſe againſt Aſdrubal; and are ouerthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe theſe his friends, is forced to make great haſte ouer the Riuer. At Caſtrum altum, a place in the mid-way betweene new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and ſtores the place with victualles, being ſtrong and defencible; as intending to make it his ſeate for a while. But the Country round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horſe haue charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare; falling alſo vpon ſome ſtragglers, or ſuch as lagged behind their fellowes in march, they haue cut off two thouſand of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto ſome place more aſſured. So Publ. withdrawes himſelfe vnto Mons victoria: that riſing ſomewhat Eaſtward from Incibili, ouer-looketh the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians purſue him: His brother Cn. repaires vnto him; & Aſdrubal the ſonne of Geſco, with a full Army, arriues to help his Companions. As they lie thus neere incamped together, P. Scipio, with ſome light-armed, going cloſely to view the places thereabouts, is diſcouered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himſelfe to an high piece of ground; where they beſiege him, vntill his brother Cn. fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Caſtulo, a great city of Spaine, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, ioyneth with the Romans; though being farre diſtant from them, and ſeated on the head of the Riuer Bætis. Neuertheleſſe the Carthaginians paſſe ouer Iberus, to beſiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garriſon; hoping to win it by famine. We may iuſtly wonder, what ſhould moue them to neglect the rebellion of Caſtulo, yea and the Roman Army lying ſo cloſe by them, and to ſeeke aduentures further off, in that very place, wherein they had beene ſo grieuouſly beaten the yeere before. But thither they goe: and thither followes them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out vpon them the next day, and in two battels kills aboue twelue thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with sixe and thirty Ensignes. This victorie (doubtlesse) is remarkeable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than fiue thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remoue to Munda; where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victory; and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed; and twelue thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seauen and fifty Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kills not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these ouerthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed euen by nature to set warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troups of Asdrubal: who hauing also hired some of the Gaules, aduentures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe: and looseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are euen ashamed, to leaue Saguntum enthralled vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of that Cittie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may we thinke it strange, that they had not recouered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Countrey once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appeares) to goe their way without it: so as they neede not to blush, for hauing so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they wonne Saguntum: and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Countrey of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would haue disturbed them, if they had beene able.

Liu. lib. 24.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their braue exploits, wee can perceiue none, than this recouery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals iourney; which was indeede of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporia, an Hauen towne, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phocæans, kinne to the Massilians, friends to the Romans; They haue easily wonne to their party, lost, recouered, and lost againe, some pettie bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other-whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne vnsettled passions; and now finally they haue won a Towne, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleeue, that when they tooke Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembred, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembred, after euery one of which Asdrubal sate downe before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebell, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselues within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the leuie and arriuall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had beene absolute Masters of the field, when they wonne Saguntum, they would not haue consumed a whole yeere following, in practising onely with the Celtiberians the next adioyning people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeeres businesse. Of these Celtiberians we heare before, That they haue yeelded vp themselues vnto the Romans; for securitie of their faith, giuen Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serue in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceiue;

perceiue; vnlesse perhaps in those daies it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Liuie followes, to call euery messenger, or straggler, that entred their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Army of thirty thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chosen, and carried into Italy, there to deale with their Countrey-men that follow Hannibal in his warres. But if any of these three hundred returne backe into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men; that all his fellowes at home are the lesse vnwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall next haue a desire to leade them into Italy. Hereof we finde more than probability, when these mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, presuming on this accesse of strength, diuide their forces, and seeke out the Enemies; who lie not farre off with three Armies. Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, is neerest at hand; euen among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Mago the sonne of Gisco, hearing the newes, will make vse of their distance, which is fiue dayes march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Countrey, saue themselues from being ouer-taken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better souldiers, that is, two parts of the olde Roman Armie; leauing the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. Hee that hath the longer iourny to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his liues end. Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are not studying how to runne away: they finde no such necessity. They ioyne their forces together; meet with Publius Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that hee is driuen to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches: wherein hee thinkes himselfe not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Masanassa, Prince of the Massæsyli, Numidians bordering vpon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chiefe honor of this seruice is ascribed, for that hee becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis, a Spanish Prince, is coming with seuen thousand and fiue hundred of the Suessetani, to ioyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be streight shut vp, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way; leauing T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, with a small company to defend the camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse appeare (whom he thought to haue beene ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all sides: neyther are the Carthaginians farre behinde; but come so fast vpon him in Reare, that P. Scipio, vncertaine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where neede most requireth, is strucke through with a lance, and slaine: very few of his Army escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty daies after. At his meeting with Asdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forsake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Countrey. If Anitorgis, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Beuterus takes it; a Celtiberian towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may iustly beleeue, that they were wonne by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much mony for not fighting, as they should haue had for hazarding their liues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to stay them; and no lesse vnable, without their helpe, either to resist the Enemie, or to ioyne with his Brother, maketh a very violent retrait; herein onely differing from plaine flight, that he keeps his men together. Asdrubal presseth hard vpon him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, hauing made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steales from them all, by night; but is ouertaken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stonie ground, where growes not so much as a shrubbe, vnfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill hee findes of easie ascent on euery side; which hee takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with packe-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weake defences the Carthaginians soone teare in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leaue very few of them aliue; that saued themselues, I know not how, within some woods adioyning, escape vnto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before said. It is a terrible ouerthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on euery side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them; could breake out, and throwd themselues within woods adioyning, I should much wonder, did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberus, fearefull (as may be supposed) of his owne life; since his Generall, with two parts of the Romane Armie, had little hope to remaine long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who hauing gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretie Armie. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lieutenant, as well they may. For Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, comming vpon them; this L. Martius so encourageth his men, (fondly weeping when he led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generals lately slaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessitie, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might haue gotten, but that he wisely sounds the retrait; reseruing the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately vanquished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his aduantage, they returne to their former security; and vtterly despising him, set neither Corps du gard, nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemy were neere. Martius therefore animates his souldiers with liuely words; and tels them, That there is no aduenture more safe, than that which is furthest from suspition of being vnder-taken. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate peece of seruice. So he leades them forth by night, and stealtes vpon the Campe of Asdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast a-sleepe, or very drowzie, Hee enters without resistance, fires their Cabbins, and giues a terrible alarme; so that all affrighted, the Carthaginians run head-long one vpon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Campe Martius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, saue by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and run away toward the Campe of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, that lay sixe miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley betweene their two campes hee hath bestowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall euery one, and are cut in peeces. But lest perchance any should haue escaped, and giue the alarme before his comming; Martius hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speed, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficulty hee enters; and partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceiued, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and bloudied with their former execution, Hee driues head-long into flight, all that can saue themselues from the fury of the sword. Thirtie seauen thousand of the enemies perish in this nights worke; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antias addes, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seuen thousand slaine: and that in another battaile with Asdrubal, there were slaine tenne thousand more; besides foure thousand three hundred and thirtie taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Liuie therefore hath elsewhere well obserued, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antias, in multiplying the numbers that haue fallen in battailes. That, whilest Martius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Liuie reporteth as a common tale, not giuing thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captaine Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with so small forces, and in such distresse, Hee could cleerely get off from the Enemies, and giue them any parting blow, though it were farre lesse then that which is heere set downe.

Of these occurrents L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good seruice, whatsoeuer it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might iudge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spaine: which the better to intimate vnto them, He stiled himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moued with the tidings than the case required: and therefore tooke such carefull order, for supplying their forces in Spaine, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the Companies leuied to serue in that Prouince, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for defence of the Citie it selfe, but shipped them in all haste for Spaine. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended offended at his presumption in vsurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to haue the souldiers abroad make choice, among themselues, of those that should command Armies and Prouinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all conuenient haste, into Spaine: carrying with him about sixe thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome began to prosper in Italy, and afforded meanes of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise, the victories of Martius would ill haue serued, either to keepe footing in Spaine, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Army, which was vnder Martius and Fonteius; he found surer tokens of the ouerthrowes receiued, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Roman party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: who how to reclaim, it would not easily be deuised. Yet Claudius aduanced boldly towards Asdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Ausetani, neere enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides atri; out of which there was no issue, but onely through a streight, whereon the Roman seized at his first comming. What should haue tempted any man of vnderstanding to incampe in such a place, I doe not finde: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, That Asdrubal, seeing himselfe thus lockt vp, made offer to depart forth-with out of all Spaine, and quit the Prouince to the Romans, vpon condition, that hee and his Armie might be thence dismissed; That he spent many dayes, in entertayning parlee with Claudius about this businesse; That night by night he conueighed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking aduantage of a misty day, He stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leauing his Campe empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spaine; we shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargaine for so great a Countrey, with one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the footmen could hardly creepe out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke mistie day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to haue been of farre lesse value. Howsoeuer it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could doe, serued to purchase any new friends in Spaine, or to recouer the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardlesse of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may haue moued them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memorie of Cn. and Publius, likely to doe good, were it reuiued in one of the same Family. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Prouince; and Publius the sonne of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spaine.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Countrey. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty, and other vertues that purchase loue; of which qualities what great vse he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, sauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity; How he vsed to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some secret conference with Iupiter; How a Dragon (which must haue beene one of the gods; and, in likelyhood Iupiter himselfe) was thought to haue conuersed with his Mother, entring her Chamber often, & vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answers; I hold them no better than fables, deuised by Historians, who thought thereby to adde vnto the glory of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not onely to haue surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generality, but also in great woorth of one single man. To this ende nothing is left out, that might serue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of vnquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, not one of them hauing the heart, to aduenture himselfe in such a desperate seruice; and finally, That this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure and twenty yeeres of age, getting vp on an high place where he might be seen of all the multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreames: & either very vnreasonable was the feare of all the Roman Captaines, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spaine Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Prouince, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard euen now, was ready to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spaine; and with him was ioyned M. Iunius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadiutor. They carried with them tenne thousand foote, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arriuall, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Prouince: which he entertained with such a maiestie, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could giue any reason of it. If we must beleeue this, then must we needes beleeue, that their feare was euen as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeere) hee did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprize was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with fiue and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand fiue hundred horse; his Sea forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arriued there together with him. He assailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wonne it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might haue been well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discouered vnto Scipio, a secret passage vnto the walles; whereof the Townsmen themselues were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could haue no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing vpon a demi-Iland, betweene an Hauen and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the wals, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had sounded; and finding some part thereof a shelfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deep, or (at most) wading vp to the Nauill, Scipio thrust therinto some Companies of his men; who recouered the top of the walles without resistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the naturall strength. These falling suddenly vpon the backes of the Carthaginians within the Citie; easily forced a gate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Towne, Liuie himselfe cannot certainely affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceiue, how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Africk and Spaine, was heaped vp in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adioyning Prouinces) whom Scipio entreated with singular courtesie; restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thankes due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, neerest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, forsooke the Carthaginian party, and ioyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended: for that he did not vant himselfe, as commonly fugitiues vse, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in reuolting from their enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by iniuries of the Carthaginians, and inuited by the honourable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeed no vnsure token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we haue heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian party, and stoutly held themselues as friends to Cn. Scipio; then could nothing haue beene deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when he should haue rather craued pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howsoeuer the two elder Scipio's had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans neuer masters of the Country, till this worthy Commander, by recouering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, won vnto himselfe the assured loue & assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this losse, were very sorry: yet neuertheless they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, hauing stolne a Towne by surprise, was too farre transported, and ouer-ioyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more conuenient temper.

Scipio.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne coniecture; I should be bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth toward Italie; and that Scipio, to diuert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vpon the like occasion, sate downe before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amisse, if the passage ouer the Lake had been vndiscouered, and the Towne helde out some longer while. For howsoeuer that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to such good issue vpon the first day: yet in the generality of the businesse, betweene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spaine should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to doe, that should hinder his iourney; Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingring warre of taking and retaking Towne, whilest the maine of the Carthaginian forces, vnder Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprise: euen to fight in tryall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italie: whither he ran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, comming vpon Asdrubal; his Vantcourrers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they draue them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, euen by that small peece of seruice, how full of spirit the Roman Army was, and how deiected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retyred out of that euen ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the Riuer, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of accesse on the foreside; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he strongly incamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, betweene the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine; into which he descended, more vpon brauery, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within his Trenches, than for that he durst aduenture his Army to the hazzard of a battaile, for which this was no equall ground. But such aduantage of place could not saue him from the Romans. They climed vp the Hill to him; they recouered euen footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hill top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to flie. Out of such a battaile, wherein hee had lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to haue escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troupes, to haue marched towards the Pyrenees, hauing sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Neuertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are reported after this, to haue consulted with him about this Warre; and finally to haue concluded, that goe hee needes must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue been true, it shal appeare at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, haue too long detained vs.

§. XII.

§. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome. Posthumius the Roman Generall, with his whole Army, is slaine by the Gaules. Philip King of Macedon, enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans ioyning with the Ætolians, make warre vpon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

WE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates reioyced (as may be thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of such mighty aide, as was decreed to be sent thence vnto him. In former times he had found worke enough, to carry the Romans corne into his owne barnes, and to driue away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, then sustenance for his Army; by making him Master of the open field. Hee might perhaps haue forc'd some walled townes, in like sort as he did Geryon, & the Castle of Canna: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must haue endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill corne were ripe, would haue grieuously punished him for such imployment of the Summer. This may haue beene the reason, why he forbore to aduenture vpon Rome, after his victory at Cannæ. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the Citie at his first comming; want of victuals would haue compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea, many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would haue taken time of deliberation, & waited perhaps the euent of another battaile: if being, either for want of meanes to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seeme) from the walles of Rome, he had presented himselfe vnto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnlesse they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauell was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receiue a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subiection. Thus the winter was passed ouer ioyfully, sauing that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply rhere arriued no more, than onely the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we finde, that after this he had aboue thirty of them; whereas all, saue one, that he brought ouer the Alpes, had beene lost in his iourney through the Marishes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truely, what mischiefes the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps inform him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as he himselfe had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the iourney; than to commit the maine strength of their Citie, to the hazzard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Hauen, to receiue the Fleete that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull prouisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere serued, He tooke the field: and hauing finished what rested to be done at Casilinum, sought to make himselfe Master of some good Hauen-towne thereabout; that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian Fleet; or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same purpose, and to doe what else was needfull, He sent Himilco vnto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to assay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Iles of Sicil and Sardinia; since the siege of Rome, must needes be deferred vnto another yeere. Hanno made an ill iourney of it, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slue aboue two thousand of his men; with the losse of fewer, than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, he won Petellia or Petilia by force; after it had held out some moneths. He won likewise Consentia; and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded vnto him: as did all other places thereabout; except onely the Towne of Rhegium, ouer against Sicil.

was

The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good gouernment, vnder which the Roman subiects liued. As for the Samnites, Campanes, and others, whose earnestnesse in rebellion may seeme to proue the contrary; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soueraignty, and were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for helpe: where their Messengers receiued answer from the Senate, That the publike misfortunes had not left meanes, to relieue their Associats that were so farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed; as were all others, publikely sent from Cities of the Roman subiection, that had a priuate iurisdiction within themselues) fell downe to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to giue them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoeuer was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation againe: and hauing throughly considered all their forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to giue any relief. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens prouide hereafter for their owne safety, as hauing already discharged their faith to the vtmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some moneths: and hauing striuen in vaine to defend themselues, when there was no apparent possibilitie, gaue to the Carthaginians a bloudie victorie ouer them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might haue reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas, in a great brauerie, before their losse at Canna, they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay vpon them so neere at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better then at home. L. Posthumius Albinus their Prætor they had sent, with an Armie of fiue and twenty thousand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian King Pineus they had sent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if hee desired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had sent, to require, that hee should deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Pharius, their Subiect and Rebell, whom he had receiued. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little surable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumius with all his Armie was cut in pieces by the Gaules, in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gaules, Litana; through which he was to passe. Against his comming, the Enemies had sawed the Trees so far, that a little force would serue to cast them downe. When therefore Posthumius, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gaules, that lay about the Wood, began to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romanes were ouer-whelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious worke of sawing so many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceiued, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might haue blowne all downe before the Romanes entred; or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the deuice was subiect; I do not well conceiue. Yet some such thing may haue beene done: and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the sauage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countrie now so ciuill, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumius his skull, being cleansed, and trimmed vp with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessell, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great ouerthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no lesse then the calamitie. But sorrow could giue no remedie to the mischiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to reuenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither do I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdilætus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few yeres following, the Romans dealt vpon euen termes; entreating their assistance against Philip and Perseus; not commanding their duetie, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For hauing assured his affaires in Greece, and enioying leisure to looke into the doings abroad, He sent Embassadours to Hannibal: with whom he made a league, vpon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, assist the Carthaginians in the Roman warre, vntill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoile therein to be gotten, should be left entire vnto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Armie should passe into Greece, and there assist Philip, vntill hee had subdued all his Enemies: (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leauing semblably vnto him the full possession of that country, and the Iles adioyning. But such predispositon of Kingdoms and Prouinces, is lightly comptrolled by the diuine Prouidence, which therein shewes It selfe not (as Herodotus falsly termes it, and like an Atheist) enuious or malicious, but very just and majesticall, in vp-holding that vnspeakable greatnesse of Soueraignty, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadours that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: & being examined what they were, aduentured vpon a bold lie, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessitie. These newes were so welcome, that the ioy thereof tooke away all care of making better inquiry. So they were louingly feasted, and freely dismissed with guides that should leade them the way, and shew them how to auoyde the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their iourny, fell wilfully into the Campe of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion; and concluded the businesse, about which they came, vpon the points before remembred. In their returne homeward, they happened againe vnluckily to be descried by the Roman fleete; which, mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gaue them chace. They did their best to haue escaped: but being ouer-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboord; and trusting to the lie that once had serued them, said it againe, That hauing beene sent from King Philip, to make a league with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reason of the Carthaginians lying betweene, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Pretor, vnto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now lesse credible than before: and (which marred all) Gisco, Bostar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparant. Wherefore a little inquisition serued to find all out: so that at length Hannibals owne letters to King Philip were deliuered vp, and the whole businesse confessed. The Embassadours and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaues. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speed; concluding, as was agreed before; onely with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heauy weight this Macedonian warre, in an euill houre, was likely to fall vpon them; when their shoulders were ouer-burdened with the loade of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and sutable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would haue beaten vpon them from Spaine. They iudged it more easie, with small forces to detaine Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italy. And heerein they were in the right. For that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, ioyning with Hannibal in such a time, would haue sufficed to shake the allegeance, not onely of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subiects, but euen of the Roman Colonies that held all priuiledges of the Citie, it will appeare by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Pretor, with twenty Quinquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend vpon the Macedonian, and to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begunne. Philip was busie about the Sea townes, that looked towards Italy, setting vpon Apollonia; and thence falling vpon Oricum; which he wonne, and so returned to Apollonia againe. The Epirots craued helpe of M. Valerius: or rather accepted his kind offers; who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Towne-men in good order; but not to keep out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspition. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence a thousand men, vnder Nasius Crispus, an vnder-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable sallie, and brake into Philips Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his campe, and raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to haue departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, coming with his fleet from Oricum, stopped vp the mouth of the Riuer; so that he was faine to burne his ships, (which belike were no better than long boates) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation alwayes enemy to the Crowne of Macedon: and easily perswaded them (being so affected, as hath else-where beene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberall in making promise, as if already it had bene his owne. So a league was made betweene them: and afterward solemnely published at Olympia, by the Ætolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Ætolia to Corcyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrey should be subdued, and left vnto the Ætolians, the pillage onely to be giuen to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it should be with Prouision, to hold no longer than whilest he abstained from doing iniurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeed the onely point, whereat Valerius aimed, who promised as much on the Romans behalfe, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, vnlesse it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this league was place reserued for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or fauored the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the first of which reigned at Pergamus, in Asia the lesse, a Prince hereafter much to be spoken of; the other two held some part of Illyria, about which the Romans were so farre from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates, are thrust into the Treatie; rather to giue it countenance, than for any readinesse which they disclose to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Pretor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet a while the onely men, of whom the Roman Generals must make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had onely the title of Nauarre, was said to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard whereunto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Armie, made a countenance of warre vpon the Illyrians, & other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infest the Kingdome of Macedon; wasted the Country about Oricum and Apollonia; and ouerrunning the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came downe into Thessalie, whence he made shew as if he would inuade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to stirre vp all the Greeks adioyning, against the Ætolians; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Country. To which purpose, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perseus, his sonne and heire, with foure thousand men, vpon their borders: with the rest of his Armie, before greater businesse should ouer-take and entangle him, He made a long iourney into Thrace, against a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Macedon, whensoeuer the King was absent. The Ætolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and winne their little Country, ere he should be able to returne. Hereto it much availed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniadæ and Naxos, Acarnanian Townes, conueniently situated to let in an Armie; and consigned them vnto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we say) euery Mothers sonne of them, in defence of their Country; together with the great haste of the Macedonian (who layed aside all other businesse) to succour these his friends, caused the Ætolians to forsake their enterprise. When this Expedition was giuen ouer, the Romans and Ætolians fell vpon Ancyra, which they tooke: the Romans assailing it by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Towne, and the Romans the spoile.

For these good seruices M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; and P. Sulpicius sent in his stead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe, Attalus out of Asia came ouer to assist the Ætolians. Hee was chiefly mooued by his owne iealousie louſie of Philips greatnes: though ſomwhat alſo tickled with the vanity, of being choſen by the Ætolians their principall Magiſtrate; which honour, though no better than titularie, he tooke in very louing part. Againſt the forces which Attalus and the Romans had ſent, being ioyned with the maine power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, theſe his troubleſome neighbours deſired peace of him, and vſed their beſt meanes to get it. But when the day, appoynted for the concluſion thereof, was come: their Embaſſadours, inſtead of making ſubmiſſion, propoſed vnto him ſuch intolerable conditions, as ill beſeemed vanquiſhed men to offer: and might therefore well teſtifie, that their mindes were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare of being beſieged in their owne Townes, that had made them deſirous of compoſition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thruſt a garriſon of their owne, and ſome Roman friends, into Elis; which threatned Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the ſtreight from Naupactus, waſted the Countrey in a terrible brauerie: wherein Philip requited them; coming vpon them in great haſte from the Nemæan Games (which he was then celebrating) and ſending them faſter away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heate of this contention, Pruſias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no leſſe than Attalus held ſuſpected the power of Philip; ſent a Nauie into Greece, to aſſiſt the Macedonian partie. The like did the Carthaginians: and vpon greater reaſon; as being more intereſſed in the ſucceſſe of his affaires. Philip was too weake by Sea: and though he could man ſome two hundred ſhips; yet the veſſells were ſuch, as could not hold out againſt the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherfore it behoued him, to vſe the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came ſomwhat too late: which might better at firſt haue kept thoſe Enemies from faſtning vpon any part of Greece; than afterward it could ſerue to driue them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Countrey. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea; it was needfull that hee ſhould correct the Eleans, bad Neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in aſſailing their Towne, He was encountred by the Ætolian and Roman garriſon; which draue him backe with ſome loſſe. In ſuch caſes, eſpecially where God intendeth a great conuerſion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had receiued no great detriment, in his retrait from Elis: rather he had giuen teſtimonie of his perſonall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horſe was ſlaine vnder him. He had alſo ſoone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thouſand; with ſome twentie thouſand head of Cattaile, which they had brought together into a place of ſafetie, as they thought, when their Countrey was inuaded. But it had happened, that in his purſuit of the Roman forragers about Sicyon, his horſe running haſtily vnder a lowe tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the faſhion of thoſe times) the King wore in his Creſt. This was gathered vp by an Ætolian; who carried it home, and ſhewed it as a token of Philips death. The horne was well knowne, and the tale beleeued. All Macedon therefore was in an vprore: and not onely the Borderers, ready to fall vpon the Country, but ſome Captaines of Philip, eaſily corrupted; who thinking to make themſelues a fortune in that change of things, ranne into ſuch treaſon, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuſe. Hereupon the King returned home; leauing not three thouſand men, to aſſiſt his friends the Achæans. He alſo tooke order, to haue Beacons erected; that might giue him notice of the Enemies doings; vpon whom he meant ſhortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his preſence quickely eſtabliſhed. But in Greece all went ill-fauouredly: eſpecially in the Ile of Eubœa, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus, and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arriue to helpe it; where alſo the ſtrong Citie of Chalcis was likely to haue beene loſt, if he had not come the ſooner. He made ſuch haſtie marches, that he had almoſt taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus. This Citie, lying ouer againſt Eubœa, Attalus had wonne, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had vſed. Now becauſe the Roman ſouldiers had defrauded him in the ſacke of Oreum, and taken all to themſelues: it was agreed, that Attalus ſhould make his beſt profit of the Opuntians; without admitting the Romans to be his ſharers. But whileſt he was buſie, in drawing as much mony as he could out of the Citizens: the ſudden tidings of Philips arriuall, made him leaue all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-ſide, where he got aboord his ſhips; finding the Romans gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignity of this misaduenture; or tidings of Prusias the Bithynian his inuasion vpon the kingdome of Pergamus; made Attalus returne home, without staying to take leaue of his friends. So Philip recouered Opus; wonne Torone, Tritonos, Drymus, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Ætolians. In the meane season, Machanidas, the tyrant of Lacedæmon, had beene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philips arriuall, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Ægypt, went about to choose two new Kings, and to conforme themselues to their old manner of gouernement. But their Estate was so farre out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Cittie, proued no lesse vnfortunate, than had beene their attempts of recouering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a tyrant rose vp among them: vnto whom succeeded this Machanidas, & shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Ætolian and Roman side, for feare of the Achæans, that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant, and Lacedæmonian. But of these we shall speake more hereafter.

Philip entring into Achaia, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Countrey; spake braue words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to doe with an Enemie, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Orcum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them, such haste they made, for feare of being ouertaken. But flight, hee said, was not alwayes prosperous: hee should one day light vpon them; as ere this he sundry times had done, and still to their losse. The Achaians were glad to heare these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For hee restored vnto their Nation some Townes that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dymæans, that had beene taken by the Romans, and sold for slaues, he fought out, ransomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Cittie. Further, passing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, hee fell vpon the Ætolians: whom he draue into the mountaines and woods, or other their strongest holds; and wasted their Country. This done, he tooke leaue of the Achæans: and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his subiects, or dependants: and animated them so well, that they rested feareless of any threatning danger. Then had he leisure to make warre vpon the Dardanians, ill neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuertheless he was not so far occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred gallies, whereby to make himselfe Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) hauing not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good successe added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldned him to make strong warre vpon the Ætolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans, either some displeasure, conceiued against their Confederates, or some feare of danger at home, when Asdrubal was ready to fall vpon Italy; caused them to giue ouer the care of things in Greece, and leaue their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Ætolians therefore, being driuen to great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what euer conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie fiue gallies, came ouer in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he turned aside to Dyrrachium, & Apollonia, making a great noise, as if with these his owne forces he would worke wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to visit him, and found him tame enough. The King presented him battell, but he refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himselfe close within the walls of Apollonia, making some Ouertures of peace: which caused Philip returne home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Ætolians, as had Philip, to take in euil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the royall offer that he made them, to serue their turne in Italie, and assist them, in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital: they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound; either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Ætolian Pyracies. Onely once they came to his help, which was, at his last iourney into Achaia. But they were gone againe before his arriuall: hauing done nothing, and pretending feare of being taken by the Romans, euen at such time as Philip, with his owne Nauie, durst boldly passe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This retchlesse dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to haue beene one of Hanno his trickes, whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieue this malicious man exceedingly, to heare that so great a King made offer to serue in person vnder Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as Ennie could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and thriftie course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres so mightie a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to saue charges: and feede the Macedonian with hopes, by making many promises of sending a fleet and some other succours. This would cost nothing; yet would it serue to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home; that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italie; and Philip, when once hee was engaged in the warre, be vrged vnto the prosecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea scarce to the labour of giuing him thankes. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal euery day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should within a while be at the deuotion of Carthage: better it were that the Cittie should be free, so as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Iudges betweene them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africke, should wait vpon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such iniuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hatefull in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Hanno and his fellows, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition, without his aduice, were too sparing, and careless, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; euen in their little courtesie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he beganne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would haue reached, had hee not vainely giuen credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the Ætolians had submitted themselues already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to haue succoured them in their necessitie, hee might giue ouer the warre, and, without reprehension, leaue them to themselues. For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were meerely his owne, and he vnable to mannage it.

The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them: when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had recouered in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the couenants, that somewhat might seeme to haue beene gotten. On the other side, the Atintanes were appoynted to returne vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably coniectures) the people of the Countrey about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not giue peace, as they would seeme to haue done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achæans, Bœotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the people of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the tyrant of Lacedamon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and and Athenians. The Aetolians were omitted, belike, as hauing agreed for themselues before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Aetolians, (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were also inserted by the Romans; that were neuer slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they stood much vpon their old honour, and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the setting downe of their names in this Treatie, serued the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a busie people, and ministred occasion to renew the warre, when meanes did better serue to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans beganne to recouer their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieuing the publike necessities of their Common-weale.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halues: and wasted more men and money to no purpose, than would haue serued (if good order had beene taken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselues Lords of all that the Romans held. This errour had become the lesse harmfull, if their care of Italy had beene such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeere to yeere, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a Conquerour could haue desired. The death of Posthumius, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaule; the begunne rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their preiudice, in the whole Isle of Sicil; as also that warre, of which we last spake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so neerely after their terrible ouerthrow at Cannæ, among so many reuolts of their Italian Confederates; would vtterly haue sunke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yeere, yet at least the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that euen this diuersitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administred matter vnto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whereupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italie: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their seuerall Armies. This had not beene a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had beene throughly prosequuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should haue beene strengthened; whatsoeuer had become of the rest. But the slender troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spaine; the lingring aide which they sent, to vp-hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already wel-neere beaten downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hastie catching at Sicil: little deserued to bee thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather euery one of these Actions, considered apart by it selfe, was no other wise to be allowed as discreetly vnder-taken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italie, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serue to content Hannibal, then must hee patiently endure to know, that his owne Cittizens were iealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatsoeuer he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necessity; to feed his Italian friends with hopes, and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cume, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard siege, that was to be reserued for a worke of more importance. Many offers be made vpon Nola, but alwayes with bad successe. Once Marcellus fought a battell with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne; hauing the assistance of the Cittizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great mens paile; his forces being then diuided, and imployed in sundry parts of Italie at once. Naples was, euen in those dayes, a strong Citie, and required a yeres worke to haue taken it by force.

Wherfore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the towne of Cumæ they of Capua had their plot, and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chiefe Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campans) to be present at a solemne sacrifice of the Nation; where they would consult about their generall good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made shew to entertaine; but priuily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of warre, and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should haue beene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately slaine by the Gaules: after whose death Marcellus was chosen, as being iudged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they fained so to haue done, because this was the first time, that euer two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of religion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the Enemy in field; yet intentiue to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaues, that lately had beene armed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, He continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Armie skilfull in the exercises of warre, than to keepe it from quarrels, that might arise by vpbraiding one another with their base conditions.

Whilest the Consul was thus busied at Linternum; the Senators of Cumæ sent him word of all that had passed betweene them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to flesh his men, and make them confident against the Enemie; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himselfe into Cumæ: whence hee issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that Cittie were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hama, three miles from Cumæ. There lay Marius Alfius the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with foureteene thousand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather deuising how to surprise others, than fearing himselfe to be assailed. The Consul therefore suffering none to goe forth of Cumæ, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meate and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights seruice. So he came vpon the Capuans vnawares: and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; loosing not aboue an hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke: but tarried not long to rifle it, for feare of Hannibal, who lay not farre off. By this his prouidence, he escaped a greater losse, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hama, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to find those young souldiers, and slaues, busied in making spoile, and loading themselues with the bootie. But they were all gotten safe within Cumæ; which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, and partly at the vrgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the Carthaginians and their fellowes spent, about this towne. They raised a woodden Tower against it; which they brought close vnto the walls, thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an high Tower: whence they made resistance; and found meanes at length, to consume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were busie in quenching the fire; the Romans, sallying out of the towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their trenches, with the slaughter of about foureteene hundred. The Consul wisely sounded the Retreat; ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in a readinesse to requite their seruice. Neither would he, in the pride of this good successe, aduenture foorth against the Enemie; who presented him battell the day following, neere vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the siege; and returned to his old campe at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had taken the field; some small townes were recouered by the Romans, & the people seuerely punished for their reuolt.

The

The Carthaginian Armie was too ſmall, to fill with garriſons all places that had yeelded; and withall to abide (as it muſt doe) ſtrong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the ſupply from home, that ſhould enable him to ſtrike at Rome it ſelfe, was driuen in the meane time to alter his courſe of warre: and, in ſtead of making (as formerly he had done) a generall inuaſion vpon the whole Country, to paſſe from place to place, and wait vpon occaſions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemie, than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Samnites was grieuouſly waſted by Marcellus, in the abſence of Hannibal: as alſo was Campania, by Fabius the Conſul; when Hannibal hauing followed Marcellus to Nola, and receiued there the loſſe before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. Theſe people ſhewed not the like ſpirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Soueraigntie. They held it reaſon, that they ſhould be protected, by ſuch as thought to haue dominion ouer them: whereby at once they ouer-burdned their new Lords, and gaue vnto their old, the more eaſie meanes, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentiue, as neceſſitie conſtrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Conſulſhip: and ioyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appoynted vnto that honour the yeere before. Of theſe two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iuſt reaſon, commended, That being himſelfe Conſul, and holding the Election, he did not ſtand vpon nice points of formality, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but cauſed himſelfe to be choſen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the Citie ſtood of able Commanders. The great name of theſe Conſuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, ſerued to put the Campans in feare, that Capua it ſelfe ſhould be beſieged. To preuent this, Hannibal, at their earneſt entreatie came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, hauing with his preſence comforted theſe his friends, fell on the ſudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he ſpent three dayes in vaine, hoping to haue wonne it. The garriſon in Puteoli was ſixe thouſand ſtrong: and did their duties ſo well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good ſucceſſe, could onely ſhew his anger vpon the fields there, and about Naples; which hauing done, and once more (with as ill ſucceſſe as before) aſſayed Nola, he bent his courſe to Tarentum: wherein hee had very great intelligence. Whileſt hee was in his progreſſe thither; Hanno made a iourney againſt Beneuentum: and T. Gracchus the laſt yeeres Conſul, hafting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell; Hanno had with him about ſeuenteene thouſand foot, Brutians and Lucans for the moſt part: beſides twelue hundred horſe, very few of which were Italians, all the reſt, Numidians and Moores. Hee held the Roman worke foure houres, ere it could be perceiued, to which ſide the victory would incline. But Gracchus his ſouldiers, which were all (in a manner) the lite-armed ſlaues, had receiued from their Generall a peremptory denunciation; That this day, or neuer, they muſt purchaſe their liberty, bringing euery man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The ſweet reward of liberty was ſo greatly deſired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vaine labour, impoſed by their Generall, of cutting off the ſlaine enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly, and hindred the ſeruice, by imployment of ſo many hands, in a worke ſo little concerning the victorie. Gracchus therefore finding his owne errour, wiſely corrected it: proclayming aloud, That they ſhould caſt away the heads, and ſpare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all ſhould haue libertie immediately after the battell, if they wonne the day. This encouragement made them runne headlong vpon the Enemie; whom their deſperate furie had ſoone ouerthrowne, if the Roman Horſe could haue made their part good againſt the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and preſſed ſo hard vpon the Romans battell, that foure thouſand of the ſlaues, (for feare either of him, or of the puniſhment which Gracchus had threatned before the battell, vnto thoſe that ſhould not valiantly behaue themſelues) retired vnto a ground of ſtrength; yet was he glad at length to ſaue himſelfe by flight, when the Groſſe of his Army was broken; being vnable to remedy the loſſe. Leauing the field, he was accompanied by no more than two thouſand: moſt of which were Horſe; all the reſt were either ſlaine or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his ſouldiers that reward of libertie which he had promiſed: but vnto thoſe foure thouſand, which had recoiled vnto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they serued in the warrs, they should neither eate nor drink otherwise than standing, vnlesse sickneſse forced them to breake his order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneuentum: where the newly enfranchised souldiers were feasted in publique by the townesmen; some sitting, some standing, and all of them hauing their heads couered (as was the custome of slaues manumised) with Caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterward hung vp in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Libertie, which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeede the first Battell, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italie: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hama, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Canna. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to help it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feede their Townes and Armies; without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needefull commodities. How they were in Italie, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse doe than before; as liuing vpon the same trade, and subiect to the same inconueniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Prouinces, to holde them safe, and in good order. As for the Cittizens of Rome, euery one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised vpon them by the poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatnesse of the warre within the bowels of Italie, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturalls declining from the friendship or subiection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Easterne parts of Italie, if they were not at the cost to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother ouer the Alpes, as soone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spaine; and the pouertie of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driuen almost euen to extreme want of counsell. But being vrged by the violence of swift necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spaine; they resolued vpon the onely course, without the which the Cittie could not haue subsisted.

They called the people to Assembly: wherein Quintus Fuluius the Pretor laide open the publique wants, and plainely sayd, That in this Exigent, there must be no taking of money for victuall, weapons, apparrell, or the like things needefull to the Souldiers; but that such as had stuffe, or were artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities, and labours, vntil the warre were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had liued vpon their dealing in the common Reuenues, that the charge was vnder-taken by priuate men; and the Armie in Spaine as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had beene full. Shortly after this, Marcus Atilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Cittie, were chiefly intentiue to the correction of those, that had mis-behaued themselues in this present warre. They beganne with L. Cæcilius Metellus: who, after the battell at Canna, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italie, had beene no better than lost. After him they tooke in hand those, that hauing brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Canæ, returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselues thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into his Campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; euen whosoeuer had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as other wise it had vsed to be) hurtfull onely in reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamie by these Censors, should bee transported into Sicil, there to serue vntill the end of the warre, vnder the same hard conditions, that were imposed vpon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Canne. The office of the Censors was, to take the List and accompt of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senatours; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose vnhoneſt or vnſeemly behauiour fell not within the compaſſe of the Law. They tooke alſo an accompt of the Roman Gentlemen: amongſt whom they diſtributed the publique Horſes of ſeruice, vnto ſuch as they thought meete; or tooke them away for their misbehauiour. Generally, they had the ouer-ſight of mens liues and manners: and their cenſure was much reuerenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rancke; or making them change their Tribe; or, (which was the moſt that they could doe) cauſing them to pay ſome Duties to the Treaſurie, from which others were exempted. But beſides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moralitie, they had the charge of all publique Workes; as mending of High-wayes, Bridges, and Water-courſes; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and ſuch other buildings. If any man encroched vpon the ſtreetes, High-wayes, or other places that ought to be common; the Cenſors compelled him to make amends. They had alſo the letting out of Lands, Cuſtomes, and other publique Reuenues, to farme: ſo that moſt of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office, as maintaining themſelues by ſome of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no ſmall helpe to conſerue the dignitie of the Senate: the commonaltie being obnoxious vnto the Cenſors, which were alwayes of that Order, and carefull to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weale being now impoueriſhed by warre, and hauing ſmall ſtore of lands to let, or of cuſtomes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themſelues much with peruſing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they tooke a view of what was requiſite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to ſet any thing in hand, becauſe they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generoſitie of the Romans. They that had beene accuſtomed, in more happy times, to vnder-take ſuch peeces of worke, offered now themſelues as willingly to the Cenſors, as if there had beene no ſuch want; promiſing liberally their coſt and trauell, without expectation of any payment, before the end of the warre. In like ſort, the Maſters of thoſe ſlaues, that lately had beene enfranchiſed by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbeare the price of them, vntill the Cittie were in better eaſe to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as euerie one was able, the common neceſſitie; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widdowes liuing vnder Patronage, were brought into the Treaſurie, and there the Quæſtors kept a Booke of all that was layed out for the ſuſtenance of theſe Widdowes and Orphans: whileſt the whole ſtocke was vſed by the Cittie. This good example of thoſe which remained in the Towne, preuailed with the Souldiers abroad: ſo that (the poorer ſort excepted) they refuſed to take pay; and called thoſe Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their Countrey was in ſo great want.

Senate

The twelue hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any iniuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride, yeelded halfe ſo much commoditie, as might be layed in ballance againſt theſe miſeries, whereinto their Eſtate was now reduced. Neuertheleſſe, if we conſider things aright, the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with thoſe Enemies, whom ſhee forthwith vnder-tooke, than abate or ſlacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto ſhe attained, ere the youngeſt of thoſe men was dead, whoſe names we haue already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman mettall grew more hard and ſolide: and by paring the branches of priuate fortunes, the Roote and Heart of the Commonwealth was compacted. So grew the Cittie of Athens, when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to aſhes, and taken from euery particular Citizen all hope of other felicitie, than that which reſted on the common happineſſe of the vniuerſalitie. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath iudiciouſly obſerued) That a State, whoſe dimenſion or ſtemme is ſmall, may aptly ſerue to be foundation of a great Monarchie; which chiefly comes to paſſe, where all regard of domeſticall proſperitie is laid aſide, and euery mans care addreſſed to the benefit of his Country. Hereof I might ſay, that our Age hath ſeene a great example, in the vnited Prouinces in the Netherlands; whoſe preſent riches and ſtrength grew chiefly from that ill aſſurance, which each of their Townes, or almoſt of their Families, perceiued it ſelfe to hold, whileſt the generality was oppreſſed by the Duke of Alua; were it ſo, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme induſtrie, and ſtraining themſelues to fill their publique Treaſurie, they are all growne wealthy, ſtrong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their ſeruices by Land. Wherfore if we valew at ſuch a rate as wee ought, the patient reſolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magiſtrates, with many other Vertues, and aboue all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in theſe dangerous times: wee may truely ſay, That the Cittie was neuer in greater likelihood to proſper. Neither can it be deemed otherwiſe, than that if the ſame affections of the people had laſted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, ſhould in all reaſon haue beene more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Aſia had not infected them with ſenſualitie, and carried their appetites mainly to thoſe pleaſures, wherein they thought their well-being to conſiſt; if all the Cittizens, and Subiects of Rome could haue beleeued their owne intereſt to be as great, in thoſe warres which theſe latter Emperours made for their defence, as in theſe which were mannaged by the Conſuls: the Empire, founded vpon ſo great vertue, could not haue beene throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer ſo many. But vnto all Dominions God hath ſet their periods: Who, though he hath giuen vnto Man the knowledge of thoſe waies, by which Kingdomes riſe and fall; yet hath left him ſubiect vnto the affections, which draw on theſe fatall changes, in their times appoynted.

§. XIIII.

The Romans winne ſome Townes backe from Hannibal. Hannibal winnes Tarentum. The ſiege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The iourney of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the People of Rome ſtrained themſelues to the vtmoſt, for maintaining the warre: ſo their Generalls abroad omitted no part of induſtrie, in ſeeking to recouer what had beene loſt. The towne of Caſſilinè Fabius beſieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian garriſon; and likely to haue beene relieued by thoſe of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the aſſiſtance of his Colleague. Neuertheleſſe the place held out ſo obſtinately, that Fabius was purpoſed to giue it ouer: ſaying, that the enterpriſe was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Martellus was of a contrary opinion. Hee ſaid, That many ſuch things, as were not at firſt to haue beene vnder-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be proſequuted vnto the beſt effect. So the ſiege held on: and the towne was preſſed ſo hard, that the Campani dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craued parlee; offering to giue it vp, ſo as all might haue leaue to depart in ſafetie, whither they pleaſed. Whileſt they were thus treating of conditions: or whileſt they were iſſuing foorth, according to the compoſition already made, (for it is diuerſly reported) Marcellus ſeizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to ſword that came in their way. Fiftie of thoſe that were firſt gotten out, ran to Fabius the Conſul: who ſaued them, and ſent them to Capua in ſafety; all the reſt were either ſlaine, or made priſoners. If Fabius deſerued commendations, by holding his word good vnto theſe fifty, I know not how the ſlaughter of the reſt, or imprisonment afterward of ſuch, as eſcaped the heate of execution, could be excuſed by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himſelfe, after the Roman faſhion, with ſome æquiuocation, but he ſhall pay for it hereafter. In like ſort was Mount Marſan in Gaſcoigne taken by the Marſhall Montluc, when I was a young man in France. For whileſt he entertained parlee about compoſition, the beſieged ranne all from their ſeuerall guards, vpon haſtie deſire of being acquainted with the conditions propoſed. The Marſhall therefore diſcouering a part of the walls vnguarded, entred by Scalado, and put all but the Gouernour vnto the ſword. Herein that Gouernour of Mount Marſan committed two groſſe errours; the one, in that hee gaue no order for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themſelues in their places; the other, in that he was content to parley, without pledges for aſſiſtance giuen and receiued. Some ſuch ouer-ſight, the Gouernour of Caſſilinè ſeemeth to haue committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, nor by Montluc, was very honourable.

rable. When this Worke was ended, many ſmall townes of the Samnites, and ſome of the Lucans and Apulians, were recouered: wherein were taken, or ſlaine, about fiue and twenty thouſand of the Enemies; and the Countrey grieuouſly waſted by Fabius, Marcellus lying ſicke at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum; waiting to heare from thoſe, that had promiſed to giue vp the towne. But M. Valerius the Roman Propretor had thruſt ſo many men into it, that the traitours durſt not ſtirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart, hauing wearied himſelfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he waſted not the Countrey, but contented himſelfe with hope, that they would pleaſe him better in time following. So hee departed thence toward Salapia: which he choſe for his winting place; and beganne to victuall it, when Summer was but halfe paſt. It is ſaid, that he was in loue with a yong Wench in that towne, in which regard if he beganne his winter more timely, than otherwiſe he required, He did not like the Romans; whom neceſſitie enforced, to make their Summer laſt as long, as they were able to trauell vp and downe the Country.

About this time beganne great troubles in Sicil, whither Marcellus the Conſul was ſent, to take ſuch order for the Prouince, as need ſhould require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Conſulſhip, we will ſpeake hereafter.

The new Conſuls, choſen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the ſonne of the preſent Conſul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the ſecond time. The Romans found it needfull for the publique ſeruice, to imploy often-times their beſt able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the warre, to recontinue their Officers, and chooſe ſuch, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any diſtance of time, which was otherwiſe required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his ſonne: which was perhaps the reſpect, that moſt commended his ſonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his ſonne rode foorth to meete him: eleuen of the twelue Lictors, which carried an axe with a bundle of rods before the Conſul, ſuffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to paſſe by them on horſe-backe, which was againſt the cuſtome. But the ſonne perceiuing this, commanded the laſt of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Conſul on his feet. The father chearefully did ſo, ſaying, It was my minde, ſonne, to make triall, whether thou diddeſt vnderſtand thy ſelfe to be Conſul. Caſſius Altinius a wealthy Cittizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Canne, had holpen the Carthaginian into that towne, ſeeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came priuily to this Conſul Fabius, and offered to render it backe vnto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Conſul purpoſed to follow old examples: and to make this Altinius a patterne to all traitors; vſing him, as Camillus and Fabricius had done thoſe, that offered their vnfaithfull ſeruice againſt the Faliſci, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and ſayd, it was a matter of dangerous conſequence, That it ſhould be thought more ſafe to reuolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee ſhould be ſent to the towne of Cales, and there kept as priſoner; vntill they could better reſolue, what to doe with him, or what vſe to make of him. Hannibal, vnderſtanding that Altinius was gone, and among the Romans, tooke it not ſorrowfully; but thought this a good occaſion, to ſeize vpon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet, that hee might ſeeme rather ſeuere, than couetous, he ſent for the wife and children of Altinius into his camp: where hauing examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitiue, partly, and more ſtrictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the treaſon, to be burnt aliue; and tooke all their goods vnto himſelfe. Fabius the Conſul ſhortly after came to Arpi: which hee wonne by Scalado, in a ſtormy and rainy night. Fiue thouſand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the towne, and of the Arpines themſelues, there were about three thouſand. Theſe were thruſt formoſt by the Carthaginian Garriſon; when it was vnderſtood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the townſ-men ſuſpected; and therefore thought it no wiſedome, to truſt them at their backs. But after ſome little reſiſtance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: proteſting, that they had beene betrayed by their Princes; and were become ſubiect to the Carthaginians, againſt their wills. In proceſſe of this diſcourſe, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Conſul: and receiuing his faith for ſecurity of the Towne, presently made head against the garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is, that Hannibals men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leaue their companions, and serue on the Roman side, it was yet couenanted, That the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Romane againe, with little other losse, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Prætors: and vnto Cneus Fuluius, another of the Prætors, an hundred & twelue Gentlemen of Capua offred their seruice, vpon no other condition, than to haue their goods restored vnto them, when their cittie should be recouerd by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campans toward Rome, it serued to discouer the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had beene promised from Carthage. The Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, which had yeelded themselues to Hannibal, returned againe to their olde allegeance. Others would haue followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himselfe a Captaine, and gotten reputation by some petty exploits in forraging the Countrey, was slaine by Hanno, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to send. Long he waited, ere hee could bring his desire to passe: and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to preuaile by intelligence; He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore townes of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, who lay at Rome as Embassadour, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conueighed them by night out of the Cittie. But hee and his company were the next day so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought backe to Rome, where they suffered death as traitors. By reason of this crueltie, or seueritie, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their businesse the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discouered. Wherefore they sent againe to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philomenes, two the chiefe among them, vsed much to goe forth of the towne on hunting by night, as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for feare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their hands, that they might not seeme to haue beene abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three dayes iourny to Tarentum, if he should haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This caused his long abode in one place the lesse to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure, Hee caused it to be giuen out, that he was sicke. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were growne careless of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their businesse in order; He tooke with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before breake of day, made all speed thitherward. Fourescore light horse of the Numidians ranne a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for feare lest he, and his troupe following him, should be discouered. It had beene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Gouernour, when he heard tell in the euening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet dislodged; and gaue order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night; Hannibal guided by Philomenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arriuall; Nico, that was within the towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was ready. Presently Nico beganne to set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his maner) called vp the Porter; bidding him make haste, for that he had killd a great Bore, so heauy, that scarce two men could stand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket and forthwith entred two young men, loaden with the Boare; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter stood wondering at the largenesse of the beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Boare-speare: and letting in some thirtie armed men, fell vpon all the watch; whom when hee had slaine, he entred the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal, entring Tarentum at two gates, went directly toward the Market-place, where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the citty, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in sight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the towne was in an vproare: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was vnskilfully sounded by a Greeke in the Theater: which helped the suspition, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoyle the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Gouernour fled into the Port: and taking boate, got into the Citadell, that stoode in the mouth of the Hauen; whence hee might easily perceiue the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them to vnderstand, what good affection hee bore them; inueighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and spake what else hee thought fit for the present. This done: and hauing gotten such spoile as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, hee addressed himselfe against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would sally out, hee might giue them such a blow, as should make them vnable to defend the Peece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when hee beganne to make his approaches, the Romans in a brauerie sallying foorth, gaue charge vpon his men: who fell backe of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst aduenture. Then gaue Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose: and fiercely setting vpon the Enemie, draue him backe with great slaughter, as fast as hee could runne; so that afterwards hee durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood vpon a Demi-Iland, that was plaine ground; and fortified onely with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it was ioyned by a cawsey. This cawsey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like sort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his helpe, to keepe themselues from all danger thence. His worke in few dayes went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceiued hope of winning the Peece it selfe, by taking a litle more paines. Wherfore he made ready all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilest he was busied in his workes, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which took away all hope of preuailing; & made him returne to his former counsaile. Now forasmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the hauen, and could not passe forth, whilest the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely, that the towne would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and prouisions by Sea: whilest the Roman garrison, by help of their shipping, might easily be relieued, and enabled to hold out. Against this inconuenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the hauen; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their streetes being faire and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies ouer Land, and lanch them into the Sea without. This he vndertooke, and effected: whereby the Roman garrison was reduced into great necessitie; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal often-times otherwise busied, than his affaires required.

Thus with mutuall losse on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fuluius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Cittie of Capua. Three and twentie Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hastie growth from that want of men, and of all necessaries, whereinto the losse at Cannæ had reduced them. But to fill vp these Legions, they were faine to take vp yong Boyes, that were vnder seuenteene yeeres of age: and to send Commissioners aboue fifty miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appeare seruiceable, and pressing them to the wars; making yet a Law, That their yeeres of seruice, whereinto they were bound by order of the Cittie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning so young, as if they had beene of lawfull age.

Before the Roman Armie drew neere, the Campans for great want of victuall, as if they had already beene besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoyle, which the Romans had in fore-going yeeres made vpon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadours to Hannibal, desiring him to succour them ere they were closed vp, as they feared to be shortly. Hee gaue them comfortable words: and sent Hanno with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day, against which they should be ready with all maner of carriages, to store themselues with victualls, that hee would prouide. Neither did he promise more than hee performed. For he caused great quantitie of graine, that had beene layd vp in Cities round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum. Thither at the time appoynted came no more than fortie Carts or Wagons, with a few packe-horses, as if this had beene enough to victuall Capua. Such was the retchlesnesse of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angrie hereat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not teach them to haue greater care. Wherefore he gaue them a longer day; against which he made prouision to store them throughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Cittizens of Beneuentum. Therefore Q. Fuluius the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needfull for the seruice, came into Beneuentum by night; where with diligence hee made inquirie into the behauiour of the Enemie. Hee learned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make prouisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great harnest. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselues to assaile the Enemies campe: and leauing all his impediments within Beneuentum, hee marched thitherward so early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By comming so vnexpected, hee had wel-neere forced the Campe on the sudden. But it was very strong and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued; the lesse desire had Fuluius to lose more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore hee sayd, that it were better to goe more leisurely and substantially to worke; to send for his fellow-Consul with the rest of their Armie; and to lie betweene Hanno and home; that neither the Campans should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieue them. Being thus discoursing, and about to sound the retrait; hee saw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart. There was great bootie; or (which was all one to the souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnlesse they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominy, than which nothing could be greater, made the Souldiers aduenture so desperately; that Fuluius, perceiuing the heate of his men; changed his purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backeward, to follow the example of them, that had alreadie gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the Campe was wonne: in which were slaine aboue sixe thousand; and taken, aboue seuen thousand, besides all the store of victualls, and carriages, with abundance of bootie; that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misaduenture, and the neerer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that hee was wont to protest vnto their Cittie; and how hee had made shew, to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said, it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if hee gaue not strong and speedie succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoile, whilest he himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in so many townes adioyning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italy, which was called of old Magna Graecia. These people took to hart the death of their hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soone as the Roman garrison was taken from them, to defend the citadel of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would haue done the like, vpon the like reason, had not some companies laine in their Towne;

Towne; which they feared that they ſhould not be able to maſter. Neuertheleſſe, they helped themſelues by cunning: inuiting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neare at hand: againſt whom whileſt they proffered their ſeruice to Atinius, the Roman Captaine, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, cloſed vp their gates. A little formality they vſed in pretending feare, leſt the Enemy ſhould breake in together with the Romans, in ſauing Atinius himſelfe, and ſending him away by Sea; as alſo in conſulting a ſmall while (becauſe perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practiſe) whether they ſhould yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this diſputation laſted not long: for they that had remoued the chiefe impediment, eaſily preuailed in the reſt; and deliuered vp the towne to Hanno and Mago. This good ſucceſſe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in thoſe quarters, whileſt the Conſuls fortifying Beneuentum to ſecure their backes, addreſſed themſelues vnto the ſiege of Capua.

Many diſaſters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterpriſe. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of warre, that had of late been twice Conſul, was ſlaine, either by treachery of ſome Lucans, that drew him into ambuſh, or by ſome Carthaginian ſtragglers, among whom he fell vnawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himſelfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans, to whom Hannibal ſent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneuentum, there to ſecure the backe of the Army that ſhould beſiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the great hindrance of that buſines. The Volones or Slaues lately manumiſed, forſooke their Enſignes, and went euery one whither he thought good, as if they had beene diſcharged by the deceaſe of their Leader; ſo that it asked ſome labour to ſeeke them out, and bring them backe into their camp. Neuertheleſſe, the Conſuls went forward with their worke: and drawing neare to Capua, did all acts of hoſtility which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome, wherein aboue fifteene hundred Romans were loſt. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Conſuls, and had the better; inſomuch that he cauſed them to diſlodge. They remoued by night, and went ſeuerall wayes: Fuluius towards Canne; Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who hauing led him a great walke, fetcht a compaſſe about, and returned to Capua. It ſo fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Penula a ſtout man, and one that with good commendations had diſcharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not farre from thence, where Hannibal reſted, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vants to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be truſted with the leading of fiue thouſand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in ſuch a time, to reiect the vertue of any good Souldier, how meane ſoeuer his condition were. Wherefore they gaue him the charge of eight thouſand: and he himſelfe being a proper man, and talking brauely, gathered vp ſo many voluntaries, as almoſt doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue proofe of the difference, betweene a ſtout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. He and his fellowes were all (in a manner) ſlaine, ſcarſe a thouſand of them eſcaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fuluius, a Roman Prætor with eighteene thouſand men, was in Apulia, very careleſſe, and a man inſufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore he haſted, to viſit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine ſtrength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when hee ſhould haue cut off thoſe forces, that lay in the Prouinces about, vnder men of ſmall ability. Coming vpon Fuluius, he found him and his men ſo iolly, that needes they would haue fought the firſt night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he beſtowed Mago with three thouſand of his lighteſt armed, in places thereabout moſt fit for ambuſh. Then offering battell to Fuluius, hee ſoone had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to eſcape aliue; leauing all, ſaue two thouſand of his followers, dead behind him.

Theſe two great blowes, receiued the one preſently after the other, much aſtoniſhed the Romans. Neuertheles, all care was taken, to gather vp the ſmall reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Conſuls ſhould goe ſubſtantially forwards with the ſiege of Capua; which was of great conſequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other reſpects. The two Conſuls ſate downe before the towne and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Army from Sueſſula to their aſſiſtance. They made Proclamation, That whoſoeuer would iſſue out of Capua before a certaine day prefixed, ſhould haue his pardon, and be suffered to enioy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously reiected; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the Citty was closed vp, they sent Messengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brundusium. He had made a long iourney, in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadell: of which expectation failing, he turnd to Brundusium, vpon aduertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as brauely re-comforted. Hee bade them consider, how a few dayes since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither againe, and send the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned, and hardly could get backe into the Citty; which the Romans had almost entrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe, hee was of opinion, that Capua, being very wel manned, and heartily deuoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time; and thereby giue him leisure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italy; whilst the Roman Army spent it selfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingred; and thereby gaue the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselues at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whileſt he himselfe pursued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Claudius and Fuluius, when their terme of office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua; retaining the same Armies as Proconsuls. The townes-men often sallied out; rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foote was easily beaten) the Romans vsed to thrust out some troupes, that should hold them skirmish. In these exercises the Campans vsually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemie; who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebells. It was therefore deuised, that some actiue and couragious yong men, should learne to ride behinde the Roman men at armes; leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion serued. These were furnished like the Velites, hauing each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thicke vpon the Enemies horse; whom vanquishing in this kinde of seruice, they much disheartned in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the Citty, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell vpon their Campe. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whol power, in as terrible maner as they could deuise: setting all their multitude of vnseruiceable people on the walls, which with a loud noyse of Pans and Basons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the Campans, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he draue them at length backe into their Citty. Neuertheles, in pursuing them to their gates. He receiued a wound, that accompanied him in short space after to his graue. Q. Fuluius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian army. The Roman camp was euen at poynt to haue bin lost: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vpon it, fell into the ditch; and filled it vp in such sort, that their bodies serued as a bridge vnto the Assailants. It is sayd, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitiues, that could speake Latine wel, to proclaime aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That euery one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next hills, forasmuch as the Camp was already lost. But all would not serue. The fraud was detected: and the Army, hauing sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly intrenched it selfe, so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extreamely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) withheld him from taking Rome it selfe: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine citadel, had wel-neere lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor the City of Tarentum, were to haue been much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vse: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, euen to set vpon Rome; and carry to the walls of that proud Citty, the danger of warre that threatned Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them atleast, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they diuided their forces; then was it likely, that either he, or the Campans, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despaire, that the terrour of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the Citty. His onely feare was, lest the Campans, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeld themselues to the Enemy. To preuent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtile Numidian: who running as a fugitiue into the Roman Campe, conueighed himselfe thence ouer the innermost Trenches into the Cittie. The iourney to Rome, was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good successe, resting in the suddennesse of his arriuall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to haue in a readinesse ten dayes victualls; and prepared as many boates, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the Riuer of Vulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generalls by some fugitiues had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate which was therewith affected, according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gaue counsell to let alone Capua, yea and all places else, rather than to put the towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the enemy. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should iudge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly sayd, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the Citty, would serue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and send him thence, if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fuluius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to iudge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behouefull: & if it might conueniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the Citty of Rome into much aduenture. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fuluius took fifteene thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choise of his whole Army: with which he hasted toward Rome; leauing App. Claudius, who could not trauell by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal, hauing passed ouer Vulturnus, burnt vp all his boats; and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hasted he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than hee needes must. Yet found he the Bridges ouer Liris broken downe, by the people of Fregella: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grieuously to spoyle their lands, whiles the Bridges were in mending. The neerer that hee drew to Rome, the greater waste hee made: his Numidians running before him; driuing the Countrey, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were pestered with women, crying and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great market, or place of Assembly; ready to giue their aduice, if it were asked, or to take directions giuen by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon which part Hannibal would fall. In the middest of this trepidation, there came newes that Quintus Fuluius, with part of the Army from Capua, was hasting to the defence of the city. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his returne home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fuluius might lose nothing by comming into the Citty in time of such neede, an Acte was passed, That hee should haue equall power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arriued at Rome, one soone after another: Fuluius hauing beene long held occupied in passing ouer Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his iourney, as much as the Country was able to giue. The Consuls, and Fuluius; incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew neerer and greater; so tooke they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the Riuer Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towne; whence he aduanced with two thousand horse, and rode along a great way vnder the walls, viewing the site thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story saith) was driuen away, without doing, or receiuing any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by care and diligence of the Senators. Aboue the rest one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of Numidians that had shifted side, and fallen (vpon some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelue hundred then in Rome: which were appoynted by the Consuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Auentine to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their seruice might be vsefull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred such mistaking, as caused a great vproare, among the people: all crying out, that Auentine was taken, and the enemy gotten within the walls. The noyse was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the streets were so full of cattaile, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adioyning, that the passage was stopt vp: and the poore Numidians pittifully beaten from the house toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would haue run out at the gates, had it not beene certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedy the like inconueniences, it was ordained, That all which had beene Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should haue authoritie as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal passed ouer Anien, and presented battell to the Romans, who did not wisely if they vndertooke it. It is sayd, that a terrible showre of raine, caused both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their seuerall Campes: and that this hapned two dayes together, the weather breaking vp and clearing as soone as they were departed asunder: certaine it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes prouision, could not endure to stay there, vntill his victuals were all spent. In which regard, the Romans, if they suffered him to waste his time and prouisions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well aduised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is sayd) by some accident of weather, the commendations must be giuen to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals coming to the City, how great soeuer it was at the first, yet after some leisure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soone abated. Hereunto it helped wel, that at the same time, the supply appointed for Spaine, after the death of the two Scipio's, was sent out of the towne, & went forth at the gate, whilst one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Panick terrors, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause knowne, or no cause answerable to the greatnes of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedy to do somewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it such, as men haue fashioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarme themselues, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of they wist not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a fooliſh vproare in his army, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tell who had sent the Asse into the campe. But in this present example of the Romans, appeares withall a great magnanimity: whereby they sustained their reputation, & augmented it no lesse, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seeme to haue beene diminished. Neither could they more finely haue checked the glorious conceipts of their enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that feare, which clouded their valour at his first coming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recouered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that very peece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was solde in Rome: and solde it was nothing vnder the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had beene in time of peace. This indignity comming to his eare, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made port-sale of the Siluer-smiths shoppes, which were neere about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the houses within the Towne, were no whit worse, than any Roman Cittizens could be vnto that piece of ground, whereon he raised his Tent. But this counter-practise was nothing worth. The Romans did seeke to manifest that assurance, which they iustly had conceiued; Hannibal, to make shew of continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victualls were almost spent: and of those ends, that he had proposed vnto himselfe, this iourny had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore hee brake vp his Campe: and doing what

ſpoile he could in the Roman Territorie, without ſparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he paſſed like a tempeſt ouer the Countrey, and ranne toward the Eaſterne Sea ſo faſt, that he had almoſt taken the Cittie of Rhegium before his arriuall was feared or ſuſpected. As for Capua, he gaue it loſt: and is likely to haue curſed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus diſabled him to relieue that faire Citie, ſince hee had no other way to vent his griefe.

Q. Fuluius returning backe to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that whoſo would yeeld, before a certaine day, might ſafely doe it. This, and the very returne of Fuluius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to vnderſtand, that they were abandoned, and their caſe deſperate. To truſt the Roman pardon proclaimed, euery mans conſcience of his owne euill deſarts, told him, that it was a vanitie: and ſome faint hope was giuen, by Hanno and Boſtar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garriſon within the Towne, that Hannibal ſhould come againe; if meanes could onely be found, how to conuey ſuch Letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was vndertaken, by ſome Numidians: who running, as fugitiues out of the Towne, into the Roman Camp, waited fit opportunitie to make an eſcape thence with their packets. But it hapned ere they could conueigh themſelues away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Towne; and the Letters of Boſtar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement entreatie vnto Hannibal, that hee would not thus forſake the Capuans and them. For (ſayd they) wee came not hither to make warre againſt Rhegium and Tarentum, but againſt the Romans: whoſe Legions wheresoeuer they lie, there alſo ſhould the Carthaginian Armie be readie to attend them; and by taking of ſuch courſe, haue wee gotten thoſe victories at Trebia, Thraſymene, and Cannæ. In fine, they beſought him, that hee would not diſhonour himſelfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Cittie ſhould not be taken in his ful view: promiſing to make a deſperate ſally, if he would once more aduenture to ſet vpon the Roman Campe. Such were the hopes of Boſtar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his beſt: and now beganne to faint vnder the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he proteſted) hee was vanquiſhed by Hanno and his Partiſans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. Liu. lib. 30.
It may well be, as a thing incident in like caſes, that ſome of thoſe which were beſieged in Capua, had beene ſent ouer by the Hannonians, to obſerue the doings of Hannibal, and to checke his proceedings. If this were ſo, iuſtly might they curſe their owne malice, which had caſt them into this remedileſſe neceſſitie. Howſoeuer it were, the Letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is ſhewed) into the Roman Proconſuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all ſuch counterfait fugitiues, as carried ſuch meſſages, whipt them backe into the Towne. This miſerable ſpectacle brake the hearts of the Campans; ſo that the multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, cauſed them to aſſemble, and conſult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vnto the Romans. The braueſt of the Senators, and ſuch as a few yeeres ſince had beene moſt forward in ioyning with Hannibal, vnderſtood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them inuited the reſt home to ſupper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them ſuch an health, as ſhould ſet them free from that cruell reuenge, which the Enemies ſought vpon their bodies. About ſeuen and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poyſon. All the reſt hoping for more mercie than they had deſerued, yeelded ſimply to diſcretion. So one of the Towne-gates was ſet open; whereat a Roman Legion with ſome other companies, entring, diſarmed the Cittizens; apprehended the Carthaginian garriſon; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe: at their coming thither, the Proconſuls laid yrons vpon them all; and commanding them to tell what ſtore of gold and ſiluer they had at home, ſent them into ſafe cuſtodie; ſome to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the generall multitude, they were reſerued vnto the diſcretion of the Senate: yet ſo hardly vſed by Fuluius in the meane while, that they had little cauſe of hope or comfort in this aduerſity. Ap. Claudius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately receiued: yet was he not inexorable to the Campans; as hauing loued them wel in former times, and hauing giuen his daughter in mariage to that Pacuuius, of whom we ſpake before. But this facility his Colleague, made Fuluius the more haſtie in taking vengeance: for feare, leſt vpon the like reſpects, the Roman Senate might proue more gentle, than he thought behouefull to the common ſafetie, and honour of their State. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Theanum, and from thence to Cales: where he cauſed all the Campan priſoners to ſuffer death; binding them to ſtakes, and ſcourging them firſt a good while with rods; after which he ſtrucke off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all townes of Italy the leſſe apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campans: and bred a generall inclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman ſide. The Atellans, Calatines, & Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made alſo now the like ſubmiſſion, for very feare, & want of ability to reſiſt. They were therefore vſed with the like rigour, by Fuluius: who dealt ſo extremely with them all, that he brought them into deſperation. Wherefore ſome of their young Gentlemen, burning with fire of Reuenge, got into Rome: where they found meanes by night-time, to ſet on fire ſo many houſes, that a great part of the city was like to haue bin conſumed. The beginning of the fire in diuers places at once, argued that it was no caſualtie. Wherefore libertie was proclaimed vnto any ſlaue, and other ſufficient reward to any free man, that ſhould diſcouer who thoſe Incendiaries were. Thus all came out; and the Campans being detected by a ſlaue of their owne (to whom, aboue his liberty promiſed, was giuen about the ſumme of an hundred marks) had the puniſhment anſwerable to their deſerts. Fuluius hereby being more and more incenſed againſt this wretched people, held them in a maner as priſoners within their walls: and this extreme ſeuerity cauſed them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that ſome period might be ſet vnto their miſeries. That whereupon the Senators reſolued in the end, was worſe than all that which they had ſuffered before. Onely two poore women in Capua (of which one had beene an harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion. The reſt were, ſome of them, with their wiues and children ſold for ſlaues, and their goods confiſcated; others laid in priſon, and reſerued to further deliberation: but the generalitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certayne day, and confined vnto ſeuerall places as beſt liked the angry victors. As for the towne of Capua, it was ſuffered to ſtand, in regard of the beauty and commodious ſite: but no corporation or forme of politie, was allowed to be therein; onely a Roman Prouoſt was euery yeere ſent to gouerne ouer thoſe that ſhould inhabit it, and to doe iuſtice. This was the greateſt act, and moſt important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great loſſes in the preſent warre. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to ſhine with a more dimme light, than before: his oile being farre ſpent; and that which ſhould haue reuiued his flame, being vnfortunately ſhed; as ſhall be told in place conuenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicil, held warre againſt the Romans in thoſe Iſlands, and were ouercome.

WHileſt things paſſed thus in Italy, the commotions raiſed in Sardinia and Sicil by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end, by the induſtrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and ſudden: aboue thirty thouſand being vp in armes, ere the Roman forces could arriue there to ſuppreſſe it. One Harſicoras with his ſonne Hioſtus, mightie men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promiſed the aſſiſtance of his Countrey. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterpriſe ſo careleſſe, as in the reſt of their maine vndertakings, about the ſame time. Yet it had beene better, if their care had bin directed vnto the proſecution of that maine buſineſſe in Italie; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would haue ſufficed, if they could haue hindered the Romans from ſending an Armie into Sardinia. Harſicoras with his followers might well enough haue ſerued to driue out Quintus Mutius the Prætor, who lay ſicke in the Prouince; and not more weake in his owne body, than in his traine. But whileſt they ſought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the ſenſe was moſt grieuous; they neglected the opportunitie of requiting thoſe that had done them wrong, and of the ſecuring themſelues from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune alſo in this enterpriſe enterpriſe was ſuch; as may ſeeme to haue encouraged them from being at the like charge, in caſes of more importance. For whereas they ſent ouer Aſdrubal, ſurnamed, the Bald, with a competent fleet and armie, aſſiſted in this Expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barchine houſe, and neere kinſman to Hannibal: it ſo fell out, that the whole fleet by extremity of foule weather, was caſt vpon the Baleares: ſo beaten and in ſuch euill plight, that the Sardinians had euen ſpent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquiſhed, ere theſe their friends could arriue to ſuccour them.

Titus Manlius was ſent from Rome with two and twenty thouſand foot, and twelue hundred horſe, to ſettle the eſtate of that Iland, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman dominion, long before this, in his Conſulſhip. It was a laudable cuſtome of the Romans, to preſerue and vp-hold in their ſeuerall Prouinces, the greatneſſe and reputation of thoſe men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had beene firſt ſubdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincialls; if any grace were to be obtayned from the Senate; or whatſoeuer accident required the aſſiſtance of a Patron: the firſt Conquerour, and his race after him, were the moſt readie and beſt approued meanes, to procure the benefit of the people ſubdued. Hereby the Romans held very ſure intelligence, in euery Prouince, and had alwayes in readineſſe fit men to reclaime their Subiects, if they fell into any ſuch diſorder, as would otherwiſe haue required a greater charge and trouble. The comming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harſicoras ſo ſtrong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not haue made vp that number of two and twenty thouſand, whereof we haue ſpoken before: hee landed at Calaris or Carallis, where mooring his ſhips, he paſſed vp into the Countrey, and ſought out the Enemie. Hyoſtus, the ſonne of Harſicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Armie left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their ſide. This young Gentleman would needes aduenture to get honour, by giuing battell to the Romans at his owne diſcretion. So hee raſhly aduentured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom hee receiued a terrible ouerthrow; and loſt in one day aboue thirtie thouſand of his followers. Hyoſtus himſelfe, with the reſt of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Iſland: whither Manlius purſued them. Very ſoone after this defeature came Aſdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia in ſuch haſte as hee might haue done, if the tempeſt had not hindered his voyage; yet ſoone enough, and ſtrong enough to ſaue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new ſpirit into the Rebells. Manlius hereupon withdrew himſelfe backe to Calaris: where he had not ſtayed long, ere the Sardinians (ſuch of them as adhered to the Roman party) craued his aſſiſtance; their Countrey being waſted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebells, with whom they had refuſed to ioyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where if hee had ſtayed a little longer, Aſdrubal would haue ſought him out with ſome blemiſh to his reputation. But the fame of Aſdrubal and his company, appeares to haue bin greater than was their ſtrength. For after ſome triall made of them in a few skirmiſhes, Manlius aduentured all to the hazard of a battaile; wherein he ſlew twelue thouſand of the enemies; and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians, three thouſand. Foure houres the battell laſted, and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Iſlanders, whoſe courages had beene broken in their vnproſperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of yong Hyoſtus, and of his father Harſicoras, that ſlew himſelfe for griefe, together with the captiuity of Aſdrubal himſelfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquiſhed Armie fled into Cornus; whither Manlius followed them, and in ſhort ſpace wonne the Towne. All other Cities of the Iſle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yeelded vnto the Roman; who impoſing vpon them ſuch increaſe of tribute, or other puniſhment, as beſt ſorted with the nature of their ſeuerall offences, or their ability to pay, returned backe to Calaris with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome, leauing Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicil was of greater length, and euery way more burdenſome to Rome: as alſo the victorie brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not onely ſauers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Country, by annexing the citie and dominion of Syracuſe, to that which they enioyed before. Soone after after the battell of Canna, the old King of Syracuſa died; who had continued long a ſtedfaſt friend vnto the Romans, and greatly relieued them in this preſent warre. He left his Kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeares of age; Gelo his ſonne, that ſhould haue bin his heire, being dead before. To this young King his ſucceſſour, Hiero appoynted fifteene tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themiſtius, who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The reſt were ſuch, as he iudged moſt likely to preſerue the Kingdome, by the ſame arte, whereby himſelfe had gotten and ſo long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus waxing weary of ſo many coadiutors, beganne to commend the ſufficiencie of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeares; and ſayd, that he was able to rule the kingdome without help of any Protector. Thus by giuing ouer his owne charge, he cauſed others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the king wholly into his hands; which came to paſſe, in a ſort, as he deſired. For Hieronymus, laying aſide all care of gouernement, gaue himſelfe wholly ouer to his pleaſures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitie, it was onely in matter of exterior ſhew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby hee offended the eyes of his people, that had neuer ſeene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his ſonne. But much more he offended them, when by his inſolent behauiour, ſutable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that in courſe of life, he would reuiue the memory of Tyrants dead long ſince, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. He grew proud, luſtfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: ſo that ſuch of his late tutors as could eſcape him by flight, were glad to liue in baniſhment: the reſt, being moſt of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to auoyde the danger of his diſpleaſure, that ſeemed worſe than death it ſelfe. Onely Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraſo continued in grace with him, and were his Counſailers, but not of his Cabinet. Theſe, howſoeuer they agreed in other points, were at ſome diſſenſion about that maine point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleaſures, which was ſet on change: but Thraſo, hauing more regard of his honour and profit, was very earneſt to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilſt as yet it remained ſomewhat doubtful, which way the King would incline: a conſpiracie againſt his perſon, was detected by a groome of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the vndertakers. Long it was ere he would ſpeake any thing: but yeelding (as it ſeemed) in the end, vnto the extremitie of the torture; he confeſſed, that he had beene ſet on by Thraſo; whom he appeached of the treaſon, together with many more, that were neare in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All theſe therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeede the Conſpirators, walked boldly in the ſtreetes, and neuer ſhrunke for the matter: aſſuring themſelues, that the reſolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremitie. Thus they all eſcaped, and ſoone after found meanes to execute their purpoſe. The King himſelfe, when Thraſo was taken out of the way, quickly reſolued vpon ſiding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when firſt they grow Maſters of themſelues, loue to ſeeme wiſer than their fathers, by taking different courſes. And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great neceſſitie, had of late been ſuch, as might haue beene termed exceſſiue, were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein he tooke order for his owne Eſtate, that depended vpon theirs. But the young Nephew, taking little heede of dangers farre off, regarded onely the things preſent; the weakeneſſe of Rome; the preualent fortunes of Carthage; and the much money that his grand-father had layed out in vaine, to ſhoulder vp a falling houſe. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correſpondence with him; that was maintayned by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a baniſhed Syracuſan. Theſe grew into ſuch fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they liſted. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betweene the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuſe; his Meſſengers were diſmiſſed with an open ſcoffe. For Hieronymus would needs haue them tell him the order of the fight at Canna, that he might thereby learne how to accommodate himſelfe, ſaying, That he could hardly beleeue the Carthaginians;

ſo wonderfull was the victory as they reported it. Hauing thus diſmiſſed the Romans, he ſent Embaſſadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at firſt, that a great part of the Iſland ſhould be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he ſhould reigne ouer all Sicil; and the Carthagimans reſt ſatisfied, with what they could get in Italie. At theſe doings Appius Claudius did not greatly ſtirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, than were enforced vpon them by neceſſitie; and partly (as may ſeeme) for that the reputation, both of himſelfe, and of his Cittie, had receiued ſuch blemiſh, by that which happned vnto him in his iourney, as much diſcountenanced him when hee came into Sicil, and forbade him to looke bigge. The money that Hiero had beſtowed formerly vpon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their neceſſitie, this Appius was to carry backe vnto him: it being refuſed by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their preſent fortune would allow. But in ſtead of returning the money with thankes, as he had bin directed, and as it had bin noiſed abroad that he ſhould doe: the warre againſt Philip King of Macedon (whereof we haue ſpoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aſide their vaine-glorie, and ſend word after him, that he ſhould conſigne that mony ouer to Marcus Valerius; of whoſe voyage into Greece, the Cittie had not otherwiſe wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious oſtentation of the Roman magnanimitie, into ſuch a pittifull tune of thankeſgiuing, as muſt needs haue bred ſorrow and commiſeration, in ſo true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuered after his death, matter of paſtime & ſcorne, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whileſt Hieronymus was more deſirous of warre, than well reſolued how to begin it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innouation in the ſtate of Syracuſe; which thereby might haue proſpered more than euer, had it beene wiſely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom wee ſpake before, were ſent about the Country with two thouſand men, to ſollicite the Townes, and perſwade them to ſhake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himſelfe with an Armie of fifteene thouſand horſe and foot, went to Leontium, a citty of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Iſland fall to him in all haſte, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conſpirators took him on the ſudden, as he was paſſing through a narrow ſtreet: and ruſhing betweene him and his guard, ſtrooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaymed: and the ſound of that word ſo ioyfully anſwered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had little courage to reuenge their Maſters death. Yet for feare of the worſt, a great largeſſe was promiſed vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their Captaines; which wrought ſo effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp; the Army, as in deteſtation of his bad life, ſuffered his carkaſſe to lie vnburied. Theſe newes ranne quickely to Syracuſe: whither ſome of the Conſpirators, taking alſo of the Kings horſes, poſted away; to ſignifie all that had paſſed, to ſtirre vp the people to libertie, and to preuent Andronodorus, if he or his fellowes would make offer to vſurpe a Tyranny. The Syracuſians hereupon preſently tooke Armes, and made themſelues maſters of their owne Citty. Andronodorus on the other ſide fortified the Palace, and the Iſland: being yet vncertayne what to doe; betweene deſire of making himſelfe a ſoueraigne Lord, and feare of ſuffring puniſhment, as a Tyrant, if his enterpiſe miſ-carried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cheriſhed him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that well knowne Prouerbe, which Dionyſius had vſed; That a Tyrant ſhould keepe his place, till he were haled out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horſe-backe. But feare, and better counſaile preuailed ſo farre; that Andronodorus, hauing ſlept vpon the matter, diſſembled his affections, and deferred his hope vnto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a ſpeech vnto the people: telling them, that he was glad to ſee, how prudently they behaued themſelues in ſo great a change; that hee had ſtood in feare, leſt they would not haue contayned themſelues within the bounds of diſcretion; but rather haue ſought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that ſince he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to raviſh their liberty perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer; he was willingly come to them forth of his ſtrength, and ſurrendred vp the charge committed vnto him, by one that had been an

euill master both to him and them. Hereupon great ioy was made, and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Cittie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Soueraignty, and so vehement were the instigations of his wife, that shortly hee beganne to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himselfe strong by their help, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had beene with the Syracusian Pretors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they according to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilest he liued, what seruice they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed; and with a conuoy, that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well contented to earne thankes of Hannibal, with such a little courtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickely of this troublesome couple, which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew; they were more mindfull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselues into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitiues, and these that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselues, when the Romans and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themistius, that had married Harmonia the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he reuealed the matter to one, that reuealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entring into the Senate, were slayne out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the euill which they had done, whilest Hieronymus liued, as by his authority; and now since attempted, in seeking to vsurp the tyranny themselues. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessary to this dangerous treason: and that the vnquiet spirits of these women would neuer cease to worke, vntill they had recouered those royall ornaments and Soueraigne power, whereof their family was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero & Gelo were also condemned to die; and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their liues. Demarata, and Harmonia had perhaps deserued this heauy sentence: but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sosippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered together with her two yong daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash iudgement. Her husband Sosippus was a louer of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to king Ptolomie, &c. he durst not returne home, but stayed in Ægypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some pitifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude; that (pardoning themselues) all cryed out vpon the authors of so foule a butchery. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger, they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should haue litle cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not onely of the poorer Cittizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Pretor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the olde Pretors and Senators approued this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betweene the Syracusians and the Romans. But hauing striuen in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in feare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicil; they gaue way vnto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be re-confirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolue by practise. The Leontines had some need of a garrison; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor, attended by such fugitiues, and mercenary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to doe many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly vnderstanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word vnto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides fearing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfe vnto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracusians. For he said, that since they had all of late serued one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, aswel as the Syracusians; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their streetes the Tyrant was slayne, and liberty first proclaymed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented to enioy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion ouer those that had broken the Chaine, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his aduice was, that such their arrogancie should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was giuen by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans & Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had beene subiect to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be Vassals vnto the State of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicides told them, that in this noueltie of change, they had fit opportunity to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had beene subdued by the same hand, which tooke liberty from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yeelded vnto Syracuse, and beene subiect vnto that Cittie, by what forme soeuer it was gouerned; this claime of libertie was rather seasonable, than iust. Neuertheléss, the motion of Epicides was highly approued: in so much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans, and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed, so that they stayed not in Sicil: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselues bound to obserue the couenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracusians; who offered him their assistance in doing iustice vpon the Leontines their Rebells; with condition, That when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with tooke the businesse in hand, which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken: all saue the Castle, whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled; and stealing thence away by night, conueyed themselues into the towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when he had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captains vsed after victory, to seeke out the fugitiue Roman slaues and renegados, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Townes-men and Souldiers, he tooke to mercy; forbearing also to strip or spoyle them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary sort. It was sayd, that he had slaine, Man, Woman, and Childe, and put the Towne to sacke. These newes met the Syracusian Army vpon the way, as it was going to ioyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had beene sent forth of Syracuse, vnder Sosis and Dinomenes, two of the Pretors, to serue against the Leontines and other rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Countrey: but the Souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had beene so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vnquiet thoughts another way, and set them a-worke in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their seruice. So towards Herbesus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischiefe, deuising what further harme they might doe; but now so weakely accompanyed, that they seemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therefore aduentured vpon a remedy little lesse desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus vnarmed, with Oliue branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and so presented themselues to the Army. Six hundred men of Creta were in the vantguard;

that had beene well vſed by Hieronymus, and ſome of them greatly bound vnto Hannibal, who had taken them priſoners in the Italian warre, and louingly diſmiſſed them. Theſe Cretians therfore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheare, ſaying, That no man ſhould doe them harme, as long as they could vſe their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a ſtand; and the rumour of this accident, ranne ſwiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by ſeuerity, which would not ſerue. For when they commanded theſe two traitors to be layd in yrons; the exclamation was ſo violent againſt them, that faine they were to let all alone, and returne, vncertaine what courſe to take, vnto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deuiſed a tricke, whereby to help himſelfe, and better the vncertayne caſe wherein he ſtood. He cauſed Letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by ſome of his moſt truſty Cretans, directed (as they made ſhew) from the Syracuſian Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the ſword among the Leontines: but that it farther behoued him, to make the like diſpatch of al the mercenaries belonging to Syracuſe; which were offenſiue, all of them in generall, to the liberty of the Citty, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epiſtle was openly rehearſed, the vproare was ſuch, that Sōſis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forſake the Campe, and flie for their liues. All the Syracuſians remayning behinde, had beene cut in peeces by the enraged ſouldiers, if the two Artificers of the ſedition had not ſaued their liues; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perſwaded alſo a miſchieuous knaue that had ſerued amongſt the Leontines, to iuſtifie the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the newes to Syracuſe, as an eye-witnes. This inceenſed not onely the multitude, but ſome of the Senate; and filled the whole towne with cauſeleſſe indignation. In good time (ſayd ſome) was the auarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who, had they in like ſort gotten into Syracuſe, would haue dealt much worſe, where their greedy appetites might haue beene tempted with a farre greater booty. Whileſt they were thus diſcourſing, and deuiſing how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vnleſſe for want of helpe, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Pretors with the beſt and wiſeſt of the Senate, would faine haue kept him out: but the violence of the ſouldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-ſtrong fury of thoſe within the towne, that laboured to breake it open. So he entred and immediately fell vpon the Pretors, whom (being forſaken by all men) he put to the ſword, and made ſlaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day hee went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue liberty vnto all ſlaues and priſoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worſt and baſeſt ſort, made himſelfe and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuſe.

When Marcellus was aduertiſed of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to ſit ſtill, and attend the further iſſue. He ſent Embaſſadours to Syracuſe, that were not admitted into the Hauen, but chaſed out as enemies. Then drew he neare with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the towne, ſent before him, ſome to require a parlee. Theſe were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpoſe to do hurt, but in fauour of the Syracuſians, which were oppreſſed by Tyrants; and to puniſh thoſe, that had murdered and baniſhed ſo many of the principall Cittizens. Wherefore they required, that thoſe worthy men, their Confederates, which were chaſed out of the Towne, might be ſuffered to returne and enioy their owne; as alſo that the Authors of the great ſlaughter lately committed, might be deliuered vp. Hereto Epicides briefly anſwered, That if their errand had beene to him, he could haue told what to ſay to them: but ſince it was directed vnto others, they ſhould doe well to returne, when thoſe to whom they were ſent, had the gouernement in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned; he told them, they ſhould finde by experience, That to beſiege Syracuſe, was an other manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee ſent them gone; and returned backe into the Citty. Immediately beganne the ſiege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quicke and eaſie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that ſo long a circuit of wals as compaſſed Syracuſe, being manned with with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately deale, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning, but did his best both by Land and Sea. Neuertheless all his labour was disappointed, and his hope of preuailing by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of hastie victorie. But there liued at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of Warre, as being in this extremitie put in vse, did more mischiefe to the Romans than could haue beene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder, had they in that age beene knowne. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remooue the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For proofe of this bold assertion, he performed some strange workes; which made the King entreat him to conuert his studie vnto things of vse; that might preserue the Citie from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an iniury done vnto the liberall sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workemanship, and gaine, of base handi-crafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians; that seemed vnto him to prophane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affected singularitie in his reprehension. For it hath beene the vnhappy fate of great inuentions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be vnder-valued; as falling within compasse of the meanest wit, & things, that euery one could well haue performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discouerie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he vnder-went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent proofe. He that lookes vpon our English Brewers, and their Seruants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an inuention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inuentors any whit the lesse, for that the labor of workmanship growes to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may bee said of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wisemen, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could slubber things easily ouer, and feede their workemen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankinde; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of iniustice, that the long trauells of an vnderstanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away vpon men of no worth; yeeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meere strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Enuie, haue in it any thing allowable and naturall, as hauing Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this; and serueth against those, which would vsurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to indue them. Neuertheless, if we haue regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection that euery one ought to beare vnto the generality of mankinde, after the example of him that suffereth his Sunne to shine vpon the iust, and vniust: it will appeare more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselues, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lye buried in their owne bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning, that may bee peruerted by euill men to a mischieuous vse. For if the secret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irrecouerable poyson: much better it were, that such a iewell remaine close in the hands of a wise and honest man; than being made common, binde all men to vse the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischiefe. But the works which Archimedes published, were such as tended vnto very commendable ends. They were Engines, seruing vnto the defence of Syracuse; not fit for the Syracusians to carry abroad, to the hurt & oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to vse them, but reserued so much to his owne direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed vnto this worthy man, that he had approued vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and donee speciall benefit to his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was beside his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastned together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these, Archimedes had sundrie deuices, of which any one sort might haue repelled the assaylants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He shot heauy stones & long pieces of timber, like vnto the yards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay fare off. They that were come neerer the walls, lay open to a continuall volly of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoysted vp, shaking out all the men, and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls, or cast vpon the rockes: and all of them were so beaten that they durst neuer come to any second assault. In the like sort was the Land-armie handled. Stones & timber, falling vpon it like haile; did not onely ouer-whelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engins of battery; and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the assault. For remedie hereof it was conceiued, that if the Romans could early before day get neere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blancke, and receiue no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were woond vp hard to shoot a great compasse. But this vaine hope cost many of the assaylants liues. For the shot came downe right vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to tarry by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrifie the Romans, that if they perceiued any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to ouercome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare; against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engines had stood vpon the walls, subiect to firing, or any such annoyance from without; hee might haue holpen it by some deuice, to make them vnseruiceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streetes behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vse them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouision of victualls, both by Land and by Sea.

This was a very desperate peece of worke. For the enemies hauing so goodly an Hauen; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likelie so soone to bee consumed with famine, as the besiegers to bee wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, hauing no probabilitie to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the meane while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicil, being by Hippocrates aduertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there so dealt with the Senate, that fiue and twentie thousand Foote, three thousand Horse, and twelue Elephants, were committed vnto his charge, wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicil by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He tooke Pelorus and Herbessus, which yeelded vnto him. He tooke also Megara by force and sackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie must haue somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to haue saued Agrigentum: whither he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned backe toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection that he vsed, in regard of Himilco; stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leauing the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foote, and fiue hundred horse, horse; intending to ioyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victorie, against the dispersed and halfe vnarmed Syracusians. The reputation heereof helped a little to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, ioyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battaile to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Hauen of Syracuse, and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arriued at Marcellus his Campe: yet many places reuolted vnto the Carthaginians, and slew or betraied the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus leauing some of his Armie before Syracuse, that hee might not seeme to haue giuen ouer the siege, went vnto Leontium, where he lay intentiue to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turne all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly haue impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as vnable to preuaile: & he himself was of an eager disposition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not faisible, an enterprise that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially he assaied to preuaile by treason, against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracusian Gentlemen that were in his Campe; exhorting them to practise with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not easie for them to doe, because the Towne would harken to no parlee. At length a slaue vnto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where hee talked in priuate with some few, as hee had beene instructed. Thus began Marcellus to haue intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators vsed to send him aduertisement of their proceedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themselues able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discouered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, that had beene sent out of the Towne as an Embassador to Philip King of Macedon; was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very desirous to ransome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not farre from the walls. There, one of the Romanes looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Arte of Geometrie, fell to numbring the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, iudged it lesse than it had beene formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it; made all things ready, and waited a conuenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therefore the most strongly garded: neither was there hope to preuaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surprise. But a fugitiue out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to be held vnto Diana, which was to last three daies: and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunitie could not bee wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Festiuall night, came vnto the walls, which he took by Scalado. Syracuse was diuided into foure parts (or fiue, if Epipolæ were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some peeces, he had the commoditie of a better and safe lodging, with good store of bootie; and better opportunitie then before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradina & the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to harken vnto composition, as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans had taken and sackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those that were sheltred vnder strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnfurnished of his helpe; since they held out a good while and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitiues and Renegados, were more carefull than euer to defend the reſt of the Citie: being ſure to be rewarded with cruell death, if Marcellus could preuaile. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected, and Bomilcar was ſent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell vpon the olde Camp of the Romans, whileſt Epicides ſallied out of Acradina vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made ſuch defence in each part, that the Aſſailants were repelled. Neuertheleſſe, they continued to beſet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as ſtreightly beſieged, as hee himſelfe did beſiege the Towne. But the peſtilence at length conſumed, together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and cauſed the reſt to diſlodge. The Romans were (though ſomwhat leſſe) afflicted with the ſame peſtilence, in ſo much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were ſent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no deſire to doe his Countrie ſeruice: but his courage was not anſwerable to his good will. Hee arriued at Pachynus with a ſtrong fleet: where he ſtaid; being loth to double the Cape; for that the windes did better ſerue the enemie than him. Thither ſailed Epicides out of Syracuſe: to acquaint him with the neceſſities of the Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readie for him, hee ſtood off into the deepe; and ſailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durſt not Epicides returne into Syracuſe, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the iſſue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian ſouldiers that remained alide of Hippocrates his Army, lay as neere as they could ſafely, vnto Marcellus; and ſome of them, in a ſtrong Towne three miles off. Theſe had done what good they could to Syracuſe, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the ſtate of Sicil was giuen as deſperate by the Carthaginians: they ſent Embaſſadors to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themſelues, and for the Towne. Heereunto Marcellus willingly gaue eare: for hee had ſtaied there long enough; and had cauſe to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither ſtrong againe. Hee therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they ſhould be Maſters of their owne, enioying their libertie and proper lawes; yet ſuffering the Romanes to poſſeſſe whatſoeuer had belonged vnto the Kings. Heereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors choſen; and the gates euen ready to bee opened vnto Marcellus: when ſuddenly the Roman fugitiues diſturbed all. Theſe perceiuing their owne condition to be deſperate, perſwaded the other Mercinarie ſouldiers, That the Citizens had bargained onely for themſelues, and betraied the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they preſently tooke Armes, and fell vpon the new choſen Pretors; whom they ſlue, and made election of ſixe Captaines that ſhould command ouer all. But ſhortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting only the fugitiues. The Treatie was therefore againe ſet on foot, and wanted little of concluſion: which yet was delaied; eyther by ſome feare of the Citizens, that had ſeene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman auarice in the ſack of Epipolæ, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by ſome deſire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vſe the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly ſubiect to Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the ſixe Captaines, that had been choſen in the laſt commotion: a man of ſuch faith, as vſually is found in Mercinaries; holding his owne particular benefit aboue all other reſpects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt ſecretly: hauing a fit inſtrument, of the ſame Nation, one Belligenes; that went in company with the Romane Embaſſadors, daily paſſing to and fro. This craftie Agent perſwaded Mericus, That the Romans had alreadie gotten all Spaine: and that if euer he purpoſed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where elſe; it was now the onely time to do it; by conforming himſelfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By ſuch hopes the Spaniſh Captaine was eaſily wonne, and ſent forth his owne brother among the Syracuſian Embaſſadours to ratifie the couenant with Marcellus.

This vnder-hand dealing of Marcellus againſt the Syracuſians, cannot well be commended as honeſt: neither was it afterwards throughly approued at his comming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had beene ſuch, as deſerued not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrie: much leſſe, that the miſeries of his people, oppreſſed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Army of Mercinaries, ſhould miniſter

vnto the people of Rome, aduantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired ſouldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time, and obey thoſe Miniſters of Hannibal, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had beene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately ſlaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themſelues had alſo beene ſlaine, both lately and in former times, becauſe of this their deſire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Raſcalitie, and ſome ill aduiſed Perſons ioyned with the ſouldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occaſion of the ſlaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in thoſe parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Romane Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracuſians, to make a bargaine vnder-hand againſt them, with a Captaine of the Mercinaries? Theſe things were obiected againſt Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracuſians with gentle words, & promiſe of good vſage in time to come; than to reſtore the bootie, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citie, ſo great, wealthy, ſtrong, and many waies important. Neuertheleſſe if we conſider the many inconueniences and great miſchiefes whereunto Syracuſe was obnoxious; both by euill-neighbours; and by that very forme of politie, after which it was gouerned: wee may truely affirme, That it receiued no ſmall benefit, by becomming ſubiect vnto Rome. For thereby it was not onely aſſured againſt all forraine enemies, domeſticall conſpiracies, and ſuch Tyrants as of olde had reigned therein: but freed from the neceſſitie of baniſhing, or murdering, the moſt worthie Citizens; as alſo from all factions, inteſtine ſeditions, and a thouſand the like miſeries, that were wont to grow out of the iealouſie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enioyed that City, from her firſt foundation, any ſuch long time of happineſſe, as that wherein it flouriſhed, when it reſted ſecure vnder the protection of Rome; and was no more moleſted, by the diſeaſe of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was throughly cured. But ſuch benefit, ariſing from wrongs done, ſerues not to make iniuſtice the more excuſable: vnleſſe we ſhould approue the anſwer of that Thiefe, who being found to haue ſtollen a ſiluer cup from a ſicke man, ſaid, He neuer leaues drinking.

By the treaſon of Mericus, the Roman Armie was let into poſſeſſion of all Syracuſe: wherein, the booty that it found, was ſaid to haue bin no leſſe, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it ſelfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea againſt them. All the goodly workes and Imageries, wherewith Syracuſe was maruellouſly adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vntouched; ſaue only the houſes of thoſe baniſhed men, that had eſcaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himſelfe. He was ſo buſie about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that hee harkened not to the noyſe, and vprore in the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus tooke heauily the death of him; and cauſed his body to be honourably buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his life-time) was placed a Cylinder & a Sphere, with an inſcription of the proportion between them; which hee firſt found out. An Inuention of ſo little vſe, as this may ſeeme, pleaſed that great Artiſt better, than the deuiſing of all thoſe engins, that made him ſo famous. Such difference is in the iudgement of learned men, and of the vulgar ſort. For many an one would thinke the monie loſt, that had bin ſpent vpon a ſonne, whoſe ſtudies in the Vniuerſitie had brought forth ſuch fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuſe, all the Townes in Sicil yeelded vnto the Romans, except Agrigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately ſent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good peeces of ſeruice, had added ſome credit to the beaten Carthaginian ſide; and withall made his owne name great. By his perſwaſions, Hanno and Epicides aduentured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not behaue themſelues as men expecting to bee beſieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counſell, than in execution. Once and againe he ſet vpon the Romanes, where they lay encamped, and droue them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred enmie in Epicides and Hanno: eſpecially in Hanno, that hauing beene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; In that hee had sent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, & to take vpon him, like as good a man as himselfe. The indignitie seemed the greater, when Mutines being to step aside vnto Heraclea, for the pacifying of some troubles there among the Numidians; aduised (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemie, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he sought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuse, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatsoeuer disproportion was betweene the two Armies; farre greater were the odds betweene the Captaines. For howsoeuer the people of Carthage would giue authoritie by fauour; yet could they not giue worth and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, hauing before conceiued some displeasure against their Captains: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they saw that the vaine-glorious enuy of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a foolish desire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countriman. Wherefore they sent vnto the Roman Generall, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpose to shew themselues his enemies that day, but onely looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene misused. They made good their promise; and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily set vpon the enemies, that hee brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, droue them backe into Agrigentum.

If Hanno could haue beene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of Warre than himselfe, and not haue hazarded a battell without need; the Romans would shortly haue beene reduced into termes of great difficultie in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leaue the Prouince; and soone vpon his departure, there landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foote, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The fame of this new Armie drew manie of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, tooke it very hainously, that no good seruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, & not suffered to return back to Rome with their General. Mutines had pacified his Countrimen the Numidians; & like an honest man, did what hee could for those whom he serued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might haue bene, if the Armie lately ouerthrowne had beene entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. Hee recouered those In-land Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Country; yet hee hindred the Country from reuolting vnto Mutines. Aboue threescore Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which Agrigentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as hee pleased, in despight of the Romanes: not onely to the succour of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good seruices, was filled more and more with enuie, against the man that performed them. Hee had (belike) receiued instruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to haue share in the honour of these Sicilian Warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilest Italie was neglected, that should haue beene regarded more then all the rest. Wherefore to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Assistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrarie: and this spightfull dealing, occasioned the losse of whatsoeuer the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countriman, being such a braue Commander, that they offered him their seruice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Lauinus, the Romane Consull, was newly come into the Prouince, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke

these indignities; but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor fauored by those that bore all the sway in Carthage: He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his owne game, and forsake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the euill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countrimen had lately done, content himselfe to see his Aduersaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening: and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them to deliuer vp Agrigentum, and to helpe to expell them vtterly out of Sicil. The Consull was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his aduertisements. Neither was there much cunning needefull, to the performance of that which Mutines had vndertaken, For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize vpon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neere in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first he heard the noyse, thought it had beene no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had beene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himselfe to flight: and sauing himselfe, with Epicides, in a small Barke, set saile for Africke; leauing all his Armie and Adherents in Sicil, to the mercie of the Romans, that henceforward continued masters of the whole Iland.

Lauinus the Consul hauing taken Agrigentum, did sharpe execution of iustice vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaues, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the monie that was raised of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessity of gold, than of steele: which may haue beene the reason, why Lauinus dealt so cruelly with the Agrigentines. Neuertheless the fame of such seueritie bred a terrour among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About fortie Townes yeelded themselues quickly vnto the Romans; twentie were deliuered vp by Treason; and fiue onely staied to be wonne by force. These things done, Lauinus returned home to Rome; carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agatirna; that were a companie of out-lawes, bankrouts, and banished men, accustomed to liue by spoyle of others, in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italie, where they might exercise their owne occupation against the Brutians; a theeuish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he liued in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipio's in their iournie against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especiall seruice. So by this enterprise of Sicil, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might haue beene emploied in Italie: leauing yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the warre passed betweene the Romans and Hannibal in Italie, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metaurus.

SHortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good seruices done in the Iland of Sicil, he had granted vnto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which was called Ouation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finished the warre, but was faine to leaue his Armie behinde him in the Prouince. He staied not long in Rome, before he was againe chosen Consull together with M. Valerius Lauinus, who succeeded him in the gouernment of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done vnto them: they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that liued in Syracuse. The Consul, on the other side, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoane themselues to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessitie; and not vnto

the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part hauing some good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controuersie, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the bootie that he had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subiection, but comforting them, with gentle words, and hopefull promises, as hath beene shewed before. The two new Consuls, Macellus and Lauinus, were appointed to make warre, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italie, the other in Sicil. The Ile of Sicil fell vnto Marcellus; which Prouince he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindred by feare, from vttering their grieuances freely. Afterwards, when his businesse with them was dispatcht, he gently vndertooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie, to the great benefit of their Countrie in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicil, whose doings there haue beene already rehearsed: but Marcellus was emploied against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Souldiers to the warre, and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Nauie. They were all of the poorer sort, that vsed to be emploied in Sea-seruices; especially in rowing. These could not liue without present wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treasurie to giue them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be set out at the expence of priuate men; who, in this necessitie of the State, were driuen to sustaine all publike charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter vnto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of such extremitie. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured so much, as well it could vnde-goe; and somewhat more, than could with honesty haue beene imposed vpon it. Neuertheless it was impossible to maintaine the warre against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That, since the common Treasure was so emptie, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At last the Consuls began to say, That no perswasions would be so effectuall with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was, that the People also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That euery one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasurie, all the mony that he had; and that no Senator should keepe any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoeuer; excepting one Salt-seller, and a Bowle wherewith to make their offerings vnto the gods; as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as euery one did vse, and those of as small value as might be. This aduice of the Consuls was not more thankefully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonaltie refuse to doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publike necessitie could no otherwise be holpen; euery one was contented, that his priuate estate should run the same fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it suffered wracke, in vaine could any particular man hope to enioy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimitie deserued well that greatnesse of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Conuenient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the Citie against Hannibal; and Lauinus toward Sicil. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard seruice: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke vpon sending the promised supply, or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakned, by the losse of Capua: which gaue them cause to looke vnto themselues; as if in his helpe there were little trust to be reposed, when they should stand in neede. This he well perceiued; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must thrust Garrisons into all Townes that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his armie, that he should not be able to keepe the field: or else he must leaue them to their owne fidelity, which now began to wauer. At length his iealousie grew so outragious, that he sacked, and wasted, those places that he was vnable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himselfe; and make vnprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before hee had least cause no doubt. The towne of Salapia yeelded vnto Martellus; and betrayed vnto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that serued vnder Hannibal; which was a greater losse, then the Towne it selfe. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect; without getting the consent of one Dasius, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dasius in priuate; and was by him accused vnto Hannibal. But when he was conuented and charged of Treason, hee so stoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deuised out of meere malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his aduersarie anew, and vrge him from time to time, with such liuely reasons; that he who could not be beleeued by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the fauour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul tooke by force, Maronea and Meles, Townes of the Samnites; wherein he slew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch aduantages, where hee might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than he. The best was, that his Carthaginians, hauing wearied themselues with ill speede in many pettie enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italie, to follow businesse of far lesse importance; had now at length resolued, to send presently the great supply, that had beene so long promised and expected. This if they had done in better season; Rome it selfe might haue beene strucken downe, the next yeere after that great blow receiued at Canna. But since that which is past cannot be amended; Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mightie succour would come time enough. For Masanissa was at Carthage with fiue thousand Numidians, ready to set saile for Spaine: whither when he came, it was appointed, that Asdrubal should forthwith take his iournie into Italie, of which there had beene so long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best; the Romans to preuent the threatning mischiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the comming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrarie, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, lay neere vnto Herdonea to get the Towne by practice. It was not long, since, neere vnto the same place, another Cn. Fuluius had lost his Armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdonea ere Fuluius heard newes of his approach. As soone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor; who accepted it with more haste than good speede. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rowt; and great slaughter was made of them. Fuluius himselfe, with twelue Tribunes or Coronels, were lost: of the common Souldiers, that were slaine, the number is vncertaine; some reporting seuen, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdonea, because it was at point to haue yeelded vnto Fuluius, Hannibal did set on fire: and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemie, carried away the multitude; whom he bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheere; for that hee would shortly abate the enemies pride. Hee followed the Carthaginian apace; and ouertaking him at Numistro in the Countrie of the Lucans, fought with him a battell: which beginning at nine of the clocke in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darkenesse, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal remoued often; and sought to bring the enemie within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet aduenture nothing, but by open day-light, and vpon faire ground.

Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fuluius, hee that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Romane affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeere to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne; like it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that serued vnder him the yeere before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might haue no leisure to helpe

Tarentum.

Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannusium, and thence from place to place: desiring euer to come to battaile, but vpon equall tearmes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemie with skirmish; as being desirous to keepe his Armie strong vntill the comming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not auoide the importunity of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignity of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be lustie, and to beat soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer suffer them to be at quiet; vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile; wherein Hannibal had the victory; tooke sixe Ensignes; and slew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pesants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had beene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumuented by any stratageme. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, he did so vexe them; that thinking themselues better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall; they besought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies foremost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victory; whereof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight againe; since all other motiues continued the same, and his men had beene hartned by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred vp with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor lost, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselues disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victory: which he purchased at so deare a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euen to recompence the late receiued ouerthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal; who dislodged by night. Neuertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fuluius the other Consul, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volscentes, that willingly yeelded themselues, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fuluius entertained in louing sort; gently rebuking them for their errours past, without punishing those that had beene authours, or busie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theeues, which Leuinus had lately brought from Agaterna, was then also set on worke to besiege Caulonia, a Towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serue to diuert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, hauing taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, sate downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carry it, either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, vnder a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentine wench; whose brother serued vnder Fabius. Hereof, she gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, he might perhaps be wonne, by intreaty of his Mistris, to doe what she would haue him. The Consul hearing this; and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to conuey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitiue; and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne perswasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister; wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the businesse, and resolued how to order it; the same Souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conueniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make resist not in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and breake open the next gate, whereat the Armie was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vsed now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well vsed, because of hospitalitie that had passed betweene his Father and the Consul. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword: in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians, was thought to haue beene made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seeme to haue wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserued his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols, that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let vs leaue vnto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his comming: but he was so neere, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill, which serued to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselues a little while, and then they yeelded. When this businesse was done, he hasted away to relieue Tarentum. But when he came within fiue miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieued him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans haue also their Hannibal; we haue lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne backe amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few dayes together, so neere as he was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgiue them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same Citie; who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote backe by them vnto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made ready his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were giuen; or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the iourny to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were emploied againe: but being apprehended, and threatned with torture, they discouered all.

This yeere was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got euery where; saue onely at Caulonia; where they lost a company of such lewd fellowes, that it may seeme good fortune, to haue so beene rid of them. But their common pouerty, & disability to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelue refused to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was considered; that the Legions of Canne, and those vnhappy Companies, that had beene beaten vnder the one and the other Cn. Fuluius, were transported into Sicil; where they liued, in a sort, as banished men. This grieued their friends at home, and made them reckon vp the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had beene exhausted with leuies of men, and impositions of mony: in euery of which yeeres they had receiued some notable ouerthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best that they could hope; was, to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer returned. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicil, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldly deny vnto the Romans their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal liued. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Townes make such declaration, and protest their disabilitie of giuing any farther helpe; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadours to returne home, and bring a better answere, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campans or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serue: the Embassadours continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteene Colonies did not imitate these twelue; but shewed themselues willing to vndergoe whatsoeuer should be layed vpon them, without shrinking vnder the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good seruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, and thankes accordingly bestowed vpon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelue Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismisse them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leaue them to their owne consideration of their ill deseruing.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelue people would haue wrought in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had been then comming into Italie. For then must the Romanes haue betaken themselues wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subiects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italie, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuertheless, they were faine to open their most priuie treasurie; and thence take out the gold that had beene layed vp to serue them in cases of greatest extremitie. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was deliuered to Fabius the Consull, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spaine to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to prouide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italie. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the iourney of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spaine, nor any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Neuertheless it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this yeere, & the next were spent, before his comming; and they better prepared, then at lesse warning they could haue beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessitie of money, were driuen to furnish the Armie in Spaine, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needs be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was far lesse then fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoeuer Liuie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arriuall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintius Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulnius. In their yeere it was, that Asdrubal tooke his iourney out of Spaine, though he came not into Italie vntill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Canne, Hannibal had lost much time about Cume and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good hauen, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italie; where he made ready a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if he had beene ready to come. But since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later then had beene expedient) ready to arriue: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that thetein he might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Towns, from harkening

to any ſollicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the pouerty of the Roman, and the wearineſſe of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie comming, then that which Hannibal brought into Italie; did embolden many of the Hetrurians, eſpecially the Aretines, to take ſuch counſel as they thought moſt expedient for themſelues, without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their conſpiracie, ſent Marcellus the new choſen Conſul into Hetruria: whoſe comming did ſo terrifie them, that they reſted quiet for a while. All the yeere following they were deuiſing how to breake out: as contrariwiſe the Roman Propretors; partly by terrour of ſeuere iudgements and inquiſitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they viſited all ſuſpected places, kept them honeſt againſt their wils; and tooke many Hoſtages for better aſſurance. The two Conſuls had an earneſt deſire, to make ſtrong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporiſing: perſwading themſelues, that in battaile they ſhould be too ſtrong for him. Criſpinus had further his particular deſire; to make his Conſulſhip notable by the winning of ſome good Towne: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the ſiege of Locri; one of the beſt Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italie: and brought thither all ſorts of engines; ſending for a fleet out of Sicil to helpe him. But Hannibal was not ſlow to relieue the Citie: the fame of whoſe approach, made Criſpinus deſiſt from his enterpriſe and retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venuſia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Conſuls daily offered battaile. This great man of warre had no neede to ſtand vpon his reputation: which was alreadie ſo confirmed, that his refuſing to fight, was not likely to be aſcribed vnto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wiſdome. He entertained the Conſuls with many light skirmiſhes, and ſought to take them at ſome aduantage; reſeruing his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater employment. In this lingring manner of War, Marcellus tooke no pleaſure: but ſought to compell the Enemy to battaile, whether he would or no. The Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicil, L. Cincius, was commanded againe to aſſaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began to trifle away the time at Venuſia. To the ſame purpoſe a part of the Garriſon that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to goe by Land to the aſſiſtance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambuſh in the way, betweene Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and hauing loſt aboue three thouſand of their company, were well glad, the reſt of them, to quit their enterpriſe, and ſaue their owne liues within Tarentum. As for the Conſuls, it was the deſire of Hannibal, to waſte their Armie by little and little: which to doe, he neglected no aduantage. There lay betweene him and them an Hillocke, ouer-growne with wood, that ſeemed fit to couer a number of men: who lying there vndiſcerned, might fall vpon ſuch, as ſhould ſtraggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he ſent thither by night ſome companies of Numidians: whom hee willed to keepe themſelues cloſe, and attend their beſt aduantage. To this piece of ground, the Conſuls thought it fit to remoue their Campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neere enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the ſon of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principall men; and not many more than two hundred horſe, moſt of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinell gaue warning of their approach to his fellowes; who diſcouered not themſelues, vntill they had ſurrounded the Conſuls and their traine. The Conſuls, as neceſſity compelled them, defended themſelues: hoping to be quickly relieued from their campe that was neere at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the firſt: and left them in that great danger, to the weake aſſiſtance of no more than fortie horſe-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregella. Theſe Fregellans abode by the Conſuls; and did what they could to haue brought them ſafe off. But when Marcellus was ſtricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then began euery one to ſhift for himſelfe, and eſcape as they might. Criſpinus the other Conſull, had his deaths wound, being ſtricken with two Darts; and yong Marcellus was likewiſe wounded; yet theſe two recouered their campe: The reſt of the Colonels and Officers; together with the Lictors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Conſuls, were all ſlaine or taken. To the dead body of the Conſull Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the cuſtome of thoſe times: and beſtowing his aſhes in a ſiluer pot, couered it with a crowne of gold; and ſo ſent them to yong Marcellus to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the custody of Hannibal; who might vse it, to his owne purposes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore he sent word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was slaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to giue no credit vnto any letters therewithall signed. This prouidence of Crispinus was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arriued there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captiue Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where hee willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employment as he should thinke needefull. The deuice was plaine: and no lesse plaine was the reuengefull minde, which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein beene betraied. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselues, how to take their Enemy in his owne snare. They sent backe the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitiue; without letting him perceiue any signe of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called vnto the Watch, & bade open the gate; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened, faire and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it must be, to let them enter. But when sixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themselues; being laied at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus ouer-reached with this stratageme, hasted away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicil, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrors, made the Romans in all confused haste, run to their ships: leauing all their engines, and whatsoeuer was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Crispinus the suruiuing Consul, & requested him to name a Dictator, that might take charge of the Common wealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soone after died. Then was it thought needefull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so neere vnto the Enemy, without any Generall. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men, as were not onely valiant, but well aduised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himselfe so strangely, had giuen them a faire-warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many seruices in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more staied wit. The fathers therefore endeauoured to ioyne vnto him in the Consulship M. Liuius: one that had borne the same Office, long before. This M. Liuius had beene Consul with L. Æmilius Paulus, in the yere foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did good seruice, they had both of them beene called into iudgement by the People: and this Liuius condemned; Æmilius hardly escaping. Though it hath beene once already noted; yet I cannot forbeare to remember it againe: how it pleased God, to vpbraid the vnthankefull Romans, with the malicious iudgement, giuen by their multitude vpon honourable men. For in the battaile of Canna, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Æmilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest ouerthrow that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Liuius, hee is euen now readie, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeeres together after his condemnation had hee beene absent out of the Citie, and liued in his Countrie Grange; still vexing himselfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lauinus, being Consuls two or three yeeres agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued priuate in discontented sort, as might appeare, both both by his careleſneſſe in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Cenſors, to pull his haire, and come into the Senate: where he vſed to ſit ſilent, and ſignifie his aſſent or diſlike to what was propoſed, either in ſhort formall words, or in paſſing from ſide to ſide, when the houſe was diuided. At length it hapned, that in ſome buſineſſe weightily concerning one that was his kinſman, he ſtood vp, and made a ſet ſpeech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had beene. The Senate was much altered ſince he had left it; many braue men were loſt; new ones were choſen; ſuch as rather ſerued to fill vp the number, than to anſwere to the dignitie of the place: and they that were left of ancient ſtanding, had euen ſpent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all began to ſay; that it was great pittie, ſo worthy and able a man, as this Liuius, had beene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common wealth ſtood in great neede, yet had not vſed in this dangerous warre. Now ſeeing that the Conſuls ought, one of them, to be choſen a Patrician, the other, of neceſſitie a Plebeian: and ſince, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lauinus, being both of them Patricians, could be ioyned with Claudius Nero: euery one was of opinion, that there could not be choſen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Liuius. But Liuie would not endure to heare of this. He ſaid it was vnreaſonable, that one condemned as a diſhoneſt man, ſhould afterwards be choſen Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to truſt him with one Conſulſhip, what meant they then to offer him another? With theſe, and the like phraſes he reſiſted their deſires: till by perſwaſions, and examples rehearſed, of ſuch as had patiently digeſted iniuries done by the People, and repaied good for euill; hee was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themiſtocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: reſembling himſelfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughes whereof men breake in faire weather; but run vnder it for ſhelter in a ſtorme. Such vnthankefulneſſe, to well-deſeruing men, is not rarely found in the outragious multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vnlike, of Philip the ſecond King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Alua. For although he had committed the Duke to priſon, vpon ſome ſmall offence conceiued, without all regard of his former deſerts: yet when his intended conqueſt of Portugal, required the ſeruice of a man, more then ordinarily ſufficient; he ſtood no longer vpon the ſcanning of late diſpleaſures; but employed the ſame Duke, whom he had newly diſgraced. Thus is wiſedome often taught by neceſſitie.

It was a dangerous yeere toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius were choſen Conſuls. Aſdrubal was already come into France, and waited onely, to haue the wayes of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his paſſage into Italy. The Romans vſed at this time the ſeruice of three and twentie Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leuie and maintaine them. Of theſe which they had, foure ſerued in Spaine, two in Sicil, and two in Sardinia: the reſt were ſo diſpoſed, in ſeuerall parts of Italie, where neede ſeemed to require, that onely two Legions were left to each of the Conſuls. But the Conſuls were men of execution: and would not be tied to the punctuall obſeruance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Liuius would not ſtirre out of Rome, againſt ſo mightie a power as followed Aſdrubal, vntill he had firſt obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be ſpared from other imployments; and thoſe, or the moſt of them, choſen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to ſerue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yeere, among the Ciſalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Liuius; to whom the warre againſt Aſdrubal was alotted. So might alſo two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, neere vnto Tarentum, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie, that was ſent againſt Hannibal. Neuertheleſſe the Conſuls, by the eſpeciall inſtance of Liuie, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne diſcretion. For newes came, that Aſdrubal was already paſſing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrie about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readineſſe to ioyne with him; and L. Porcius ſent word, that he would aduenture no further, then hee ſafely might. When all was ordered, as themſelues thought beſt, the two Conſuls went forth of the Citie; each, his ſeuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwiſe affected, than they had beene, when L. Æmylius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generals; or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie betimes: but rather they stood in feare; least all diligence, wisdome and valour should proue too little. For since few yeeres had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not beene slaine; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victor; and come off with honour, from such mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreame difficultie had Rome held vp her head, euer since the battaile of Canna: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italie. But there was now arriued another sonne of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed, a man of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riuers and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Asdrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-bal, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many vnto them; caused the people of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne; like a pensiue traine of Mourners: thinking vpon Marcellus and Crispinus, vpon whom in the like sort they had giuen attendance the last yeere; but saw neither of them returne aliue, from a lesse dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accustomed aduice to M. Liuius, that he should abstaine from giuing, or taking battaile, vntill he well vnderstood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answere, and said, That he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victory; or by seeing the ouerthrow of his owne vniust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the ioy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the ouerthrow that Asdrubal receiued in Spaine by Scipio, a little before he tooke his iournie into Italie; such mention hath already beene made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Liuie. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historie concerning that accident. Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spaine; by reason of those Captaines that were sent from the Citie of Carthage, to ioyne with him in the administration of that Prouince: they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the aduantage of their owne side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthie sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindred his courses vndertaken, it cannot be knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to vs remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicil with Mutines, a better man of warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Iland: we may conceiue, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needefull, by these mischieuous Partisans of Hanno, to vse the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Neuertheless Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutines could not long digest. His iournie into Italie being resolued vpon: he lay with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the mines of siluer; whence hee was to furnish his expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe, though hee were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The ouerthrow seemes not to haue beene so great, as it must haue beene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appeares, that Asdrubal dealt like a prouident man, and seeing that his Campe was likely to be forced, sent away all his mony, with his Elephants before him: but staied behinde himselfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed ouer Tagus. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pirenees: leauing the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal

the fortune of Gesco; that thought himself the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio haue stopped him on his iourney, by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the Mountaines. But whether Asdrubal tooke another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keepe the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly fors to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaule, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his monie, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their number much increased, by accesse of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choyce: for that hee was driuen to Winter in their Countrie, whilest that the passages of the Alpes were closed vp with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his iournie ouer the Alpes, were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he trauailed through their Countrie. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily perswaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattaile, and to make spoyle of that little wealth, which they had painefully scraped together out of the defolate rocks. But now in processe of time, they were better informed. Therefore vnderstanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre disioyned asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alpes did onely lye in the way: they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gaules. The Lygurians also ioyned with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians haue done, if he had arriued in their Countrie. There was no other Roman Armie neere, then L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there he lost a great deale of time, and finally was driuen to quit the enterprise: by vndertaking which, he gaue the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Asdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leaue his wintring camps, and goe forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speede he could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about fortie thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse: with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginian; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driuen to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Countrie of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weake for the iournie intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought vnprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuertheless he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driuen to returne to Metapontum: where ioyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Armie, he assaied againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came againe to Venusia, hauing Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he ouer the Riuer Aufidus to Cannusium, where he sate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrie very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouer-come the way to Canusium: where if he could once againe deale with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once hee had gotten in the same open Countrie. If this had so fallen out; Rome would haue beene vndone for euer. But the Carthaginians should not haue needed to wish any second victory, in the naked Champans about Canne: if such an armie, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italie; which else no power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilest Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their succour: he was aduertised of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gaue notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Liuie the Consul. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing ioyfull. For if Hannibal could once be ioyned as head, vnto that great body of an Armie, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparant, that howsoeuer the fortune of Rome should auoid, for the present, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint vnder the burden; as twelue of the thirtie Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he resolued, that it were better to make any desperate aduenture, than to suffer the coniunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the suddaine, yet within few yeeres, was like to worke most lamentable effects. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse, that could doe seruice in such a needefull case; excepting those, that were already employed vnder the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian bretheren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choyce of his Armie: and making shew, as if he would onely step aside, to doe some small piece of seruice neere at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers rahne before him, to giue warning to all Townes by which hee was to passe, that they should be ready to meet him, with victuals, and all other necessaries for his Armie. Liuius the other Consul, at that time, lay incamped, neere vnto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In sixe dayes Nero had finished his iournie thither; and when he drew neere, sent Messengers before him, to giue notice of his comming. Liuie thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of couert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: lest the Enemy, perceiuing this accesse of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done: and a token giuen, that the Colonels, Captaines, and all Souldiers, aswell horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; should be lodged and entertained by men of their owne sort. Their Companie was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that ioyned with them on the way. Neuertheless, it was not needefull, that the Quarter which receiued them, should be enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counsaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arriued Companies, to refresh themselues a few dayes after their wearie iournie, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should haue notice of his absence. The Souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiuing that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battaile would not haue beene vndertaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generals pauilion.

Asdrubal was no lesse willing than the Romans to come to battaile, hauing long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long iournie. Hereupon he beganne to with-draw his Armie backe into the Campe: and gaue order, that if no prisoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified of the truth; yet should there good obseruation be made, whether the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The campe, as hath beene said, was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded onely once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, sound twice in the the quarter of Liuius the Consul. Hereat Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders, held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arriued. How this might be, if Hannibal were aliue, and in good case, hee was not able to coniecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke, till hee might be better informed. Vpon confidence in his owne forces, hee had not cared hitherto, how neere he lay to the Romans, nor troubled himselfe perhaps with ouer-strongly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceiued, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, he changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remoue a little further off. So hee dislodged secretly by night, intending to get ouer the Riuer Metaurus; whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessitie of battaile. But whether it were so, that his guides did steale away from him in the dark, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heauie, and hindred his speede: farre he had not gone, ere the Consull Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horse, and staied him from passing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions, in good order, and ready for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe ouer-taken with necessitie to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which the Enemie should not, without much difficultie, be able to climbe: in the right wing he stood himselfe with his Africans & Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midst; and his Elephants, he bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Liuius of the left; and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well vnderstood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was vnto the vanquished. Onely the Romans herein seemed to haue had the better in conceipt, and opinion; That they were to fight with men desirous to haue fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Liuius the Consul with a proud bravery, to giue charge on the Africans: by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the victory seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout Souldiers, and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to giue ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Liuius therefore, and Porcius, found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, preuailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first rankes; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driuen to fall backe. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gaules, that stood opposite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiuing that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended, tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Liuius: which hauing compassed, he fell vpon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here beganne the victory to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in frone, ranne all along the depth of Asdrubal his battaile: and falling vpon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rowt. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on euery side, the greatest part was slaine. The Ligurians and Gaules escaped as they could; and saued themselues by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken aliue: the rest were slaine; some by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that rode on them. For when any of them, being sore wounded, beganne to waxe vnruly, and rush backe vpon their own battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke betweene the eares, in the ioynt of the neck, next vnto the head; wherewith he killed the beast vpon the suddaine. This speedy way of preuenting such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the squadrons following them; is said to haue borne the deuice of Asdrubal himselfe; who died in this battaile.

Great commendations are giuen to Asdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Liuie. He is said at all times to haue shewed himselfe worthy of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother; to haue striuen with great patience, against many difficulties; whereinto he fell by the meanes of those Captaines that were sent from Carthage into Spaine; to haue performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthy Generall; and finally when hee saw the losse irreparable, to haue ridden manfully into the chiefest of his enemies; where fighting bruely, he was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Livie, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree. For Livie saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an ouerthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Canne; that fiftie six thousand of them were slaine, fiue thousand and foure hundred taken prisoners, and aboue foure thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and set at libertie. He saith also, that of the Romanes and their Associates there were slaine eight thousand: and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not onely in other kindes, but in gold and siluer. Concerning the bootie, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to haue beene as rich as Livie reported it; for Asdrubal came well stored with monie. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Metaurus, a parallel vnto that of Canne) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side, and two thousand of the Romans, to haue beene slaine. The number of the prisoners hee doth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken aliue, and that all the rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme that they were all Barchines: for asmuch as they preferred the honour of themselues, and of their Countrie, aboue their liues.

The ioy of this victorie was no lesse in Rome, then had beene the feare of the euent. For euer since it was knowne in what sort Nero had left his Armie; the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his comming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great aduenture, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to haue notice of his his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Armie that staied behinde, much weakened, and without a Generall? Thus did they talke; yet reseruing their censure vnto the successe; with libertie to approue or condemne, according to the issue. In the meane time the people filled the Market-place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsaile, waiting still ready at hand vpon the Magistrates: as if some great matter were likely to fal out, that would aske euery ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholy, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleeue it. Afterwards when Messengers arriued from the Consuls, with Letters containing all that had passed: there was not onely great and ioyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their priuate businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborne to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driuen out of Italie.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them loose to giue Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of the misaduenture, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal; especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had giuen buriall to Graechus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generals, whose carkasses fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoeuer the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Commonweale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were farre more ciuill, and lesse prone to the insolencie of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That hee forgot himselfe, being ouer-ioyed with the greatnesse of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal hauing lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italie; with-drew himselfe into the Countrie of the Brutians: and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remoone; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For hee wanted men to defend so many places as hee held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compasse in the vtmost corner of Italie; it being a Countrie of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly deuoted to his seruice. In this businesse Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, hauing all his forces vnited; or because it is likely that this remoue of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harueſt was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Liuius the other Consul tarried among the Cisalpine Gaules vntill the end of Summer; there to set things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, he wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Armie in that Prouince; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, he desired leaue to returne home; and that hee might bring his Armie with him. The Senate well vnderstood his meaning: which was, to haue the honour of triumph, as hee well deserued. But forasmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late victorie: order was giuen, that not onely Liuie with his Armie should come home; but likewise Nero; though leauing his Armie behinde him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Liuie made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victorie was gotten; his Armie also being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horse-backe, and without such attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victorie was in a manner wholly ascribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cæcilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generalls, the due acknowledgement of their good seruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls: and Consuls they were chosen for the yeere following. But nothing was done by them, worthie of memorie, in their Consulship. Neither indeed from this yeere, which was the thirteenth of the present warre, vntill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italie; saue only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by surprise. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceiued of him; that though all about him went to ruine; yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himselfe vpright. And surely very notable are the commendations giuen vnto him by Polybius; whom Liuie therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, he obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Armie, compounded of so many sundrie Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greekes; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in such good order, that they neuer fell to sedition among themselues, or against their Generall. But that which Liuie addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry soile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparant, that by his proper worth and vertue, hee kept his Armie in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Asdrubal, he made no inuasion vpon the wealthier parts of Italie; but held himselfe still among the poore Brutians. Where we must leaue him, vntill hee be drawne into Africk by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

§. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman, made entire conquest of Spaine.

†. I.

How the Carthaginians were driuen by Scipio from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

MAgo and Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, took vpon them the charge of Spaine, when Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar departed thence into Italie. These agreed together, that Mago should make a voyage to the Baleares; there to leuie a supply of men:

men: and Asdrubal with-draw himselfe into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill meanes to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Mago had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where hee met with one Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately beene employed in Sicil) who brought new forces out of Africk, and came to succeed in place of Asdrubal the Barchine. It is not vnlikelie that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that sonne of Amilcar, whose authoritie had beene greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approue it selfe, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought ouer: Hanno tooke the field, and led Mago with him; as purposing afresh to set vpon the Romans. So he entred into the Country of the Celtiberians, not very farre from new Carthage: where, by monie, and other perswasions, he leuied aboue nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: attentiue, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to haue sent part of his forces into Italie, to the assistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius the Consuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celtiberians: he sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and fiue hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitiue Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countrimen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherfore as closely as he was able, he drew neere to these Celtiberians: and falling vpon them on the suddaine, gaue them such an ouerthrow, that Hanno and Mago comming to their succour, in stead of heartning and reinforcing them, became partakers of the losse. Mago saued himselfe with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten daies iourney brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either slaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntill all was lost. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make shift; and saued most of themselues by running into the woods.

It could no otherwise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italie stood, by the comming thither of Asdrubal. Ten thousand foot and eighteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrie: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentiue to the necessitie and successe of his Countrimen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of this Summer, then might hee well aduenture, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spaine; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an ouerthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that serued vnder Hannibal, and those that had beene sent ouer into Africke; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countrie was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noysed abroad, That all which had followed Asdrubal into Italie, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Armie was closed vp in a streight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conforme themselues vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italie, which gaue such confidence vnto Scipio; it is the more probable, because hee tooke not this great enterprise in hand, vntill the Summer was almost spent. Asdrubal therefore vsed the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons; hindred the enemy from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, caused Scipio to returne backe: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio tooke by assault the Towne of Oringis.

Against the next yeeres danger, Asdrubal prepared a great Armie: and spared not cost, nor trauaile, in strengthening himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spaine. With seuentie thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirtie Elephants, he tooke the field: which number I beleeue, that he could hardly haue raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italie. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weake to encounter with ſuch a multitude. Wherefore hee iudged it needfull to vſe the helpe of his Spaniſh friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were caſt away by the treaſon of ſuch falſe Auxiliaries, made him on the other ſide very doubtfull, of relying vpon thoſe, that might perhaps betray him in his greateſt neede. Yet ſince one Colchas, that was Lord of eight and twenty Townes, had promiſed him the laſt Winter, to raiſe three thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe for his ſeruice: he reſolued to make vſe of thoſe, and ſome few others, that might helpe to make a ſhew; and yet not bee able to doe any great harme, if they would reuolt. So with fiue and forty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, hee ſought out the Enemie; neere vnto whom hee encamped. At his firſt comming, Mago and Maſaniſſa fell vpon him; with hope to take him vnprepared, whileſt he was making his lodgings. But he layed certaine troups of horſe in couert: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; cauſed them to fall off. They made at firſt an orderly retreat: but being more hardly preſſed, they ſhortly betooke themſelues to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added ſome courage to the Romans, and abated the preſumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmiſhes betweene the horſe and light armature, on both ſides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Aſdrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to ſhew that he durſt fight, yet not proceeding any farther. Thus they continued many daies: Aſdrubal being ſtill the firſt that iſſued forth in the morning; and the firſt that, in the euening, withdrew himſelfe into his Trenches. The Spaniſh Auxiliaries were placed on both ſides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midſt, with their Elephants before them; and oppoſite to theſe on the other ſide were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre diſtance, many daies together: it grew to bee the common opinion, that they ſhould ſhortly meet in the ſame forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies long before deſigned. But Scipio when he purpoſed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forth earlier then he had beene wont. He cauſed his men and horſes, to be well fedde betimes in the morning before day: and then ſent forth his horſe and light armature, to traine out the Carthaginians with their bellies emptie: vſing herein the ſame tricke, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he beſtowed in the wings; his Spaniards, in the battaile. Aſdrubal ſent forth his horſe in all haſte, to entertaine the Romans; whileſt he himſelfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which hee encamped. In the skirmiſhes of the horſe it could not bee diſcerned which part had the better: ſince being ouer-preſſed on either ſide, they had a ſafe retrait vnto their foote; and one troope ſeconding another by courſe, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: becauſe his men, hauing well fed themſelues, were like to hold out better then the Enemie. But about noone hee cauſed his wings to aduance a good pace; leauing their battaile of Spaniards farre behinde them, that came on leiſurely; according to direction. The Spaniſh Mercenaries that ſtood in Aſdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, ſaue only in number, to the Latine and Romane Souldiers, that came againſt them; for they were freſh Souldiers, leuied in haſte; and fighting onely in reſpect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the ſame time, by the Roman Velites, and by ſome cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the ſame purpoſe, they were ſorely preſſed; and with much difficultie made reſiſtance. The Carthaginians would faine haue ſuccoured them; but that they durſt not ſtirre out of their places, becauſe of the Spaniſh battell which was comming againſt them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the beſt part of Aſdrubal his Armie ſtood idle, vntill the wings were broken. For, had he aduentured to meet with the Spaniards, hee muſt haue caſt himſelfe into the open ſpace that lay before him betweene the Romane wings: to the depth whereof when hee had arriued, hee ſhould haue found himſelfe incloſed in ſuch ſort, as was the Conſull Paulus at the battaile of Canna. Wherefore hee did onely imploy his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chance ledde them, and troubled both parts; or thoſe perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In proceſſe of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreſhed their bodies in the morning, endured luſtie; when the others beganne to faint with trauell and heate of the day.

Where-

Wherefore perceiuing their aduantage, they followed it the more hotly: and gaue not ouer, till they had forst the enemie to change his pace and run from him. Asdrubal did his best to haue made an orderlie retrait; and afterward againe, to haue caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not suffer the victorie to be so extorted from them: neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished; ledde by the obstinate passion of feare which harkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day beene taken; if a storme of raine, which fell violently on the sodaine, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to giue ouer.

The same night Asdrubal gaue no rest to his men: but caused them, hungrie, and ouerlaboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein he feared to 1 be assaulted. But little assurance could he haue in the strength of his Trenches; when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subiects: many followed this example; and soone after, two strong Townes were yeelded vp to Scipio, and the Garrisons betraied. It seemes that the peruerse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleeue the more easily those reports which they heard from Italie. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiuing this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away faster then an ordinarie pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and ouertaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand, that 2 they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, saue onely seuen thousand that with Asdrubal himselfe recouered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in hast. The place he made shift a while to defend: but wanting there necessaries to sustain himselfe long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore hee resolued to make shift for one; and stealing from his Companie by night away to the Sea-side, that was not farre thence; hee tooke shipping, and set saile for Gades. When Scipio vnderstood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse to besiege their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masanissa staied in it) whilest hee with the rest of the Armie 3 did what was needfull in the Countrie abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masanissa followed Asdrubal to Gades: and their Army dispersed it selfe; some flying ouer to the Romanes; other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the Continent of Spaine, there were onely three Townes left, Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of warre against the Romans: of which onely Castulo had a Carthaginian Garrison; consisting of such as had saued themselues by flight in the late ouerthrows. Hereby it seemes, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yeelded long since vnto the Romans; though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the last three Townes that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illiturgi had sometimes 4 beene inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their deuotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not onely rebelled; but with great crueltie betraied, and slue, the poore men that escaped thither from the ouer-throwes. Astapa was a Towne that still adhered to the Carthaginians; and which was worse, had thriuen by the spoyle of the Romanes and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeere) Scipio went against these, and tooke himselfe Illiturgi and Castulo: Illiturgi by assault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius, or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: whereinto was throwne all the gold, & siluer, with whatsoeuer else was precious; 5 the women and children standing by it vnder a sure guard; that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouision being made: all the Inhabitants that could beare Armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell vpon the Roman campe; where striuing beyond their power, they were euery one slaine. Then was the Towne forth-with set on fire, by those that had taken charge to doe it: and many of the Romans consumed with the flame; whilest they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold, and siluer, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal, being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seuen Gallies, leauing Mago behinde him, to wait vpon occasion, occasion, if any should be offered. He visited in his way home, Syphax King of the Massili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to win him to the friendship of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his euill Angel, in the Kings Port: who, landing at the same time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, hauing driuen the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did forth-with bethink himselfe, how to finish the war; by putting them to the like distresse in Africke. Hereunto it seemed that the helpe of Syphax would be much auaileable: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and sustained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might easily be moued to seeke reuenge. He had also bin beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that sent him ouer a Captaine into Africke; who instructed him so well in marshalling his forces, as hee thereby often became victorious. Vpon these reasons the Numidian King sent Embassadors to Rome, and made league with the Citie in time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceiued hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Africk; vpon the friendship of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cause he sent ouer C. Lælius his Embassador, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italie, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine, easily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Onely Syphax requested that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which hee was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Hereto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthy of the aduenture. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he tooke Sea: and arriued in the Kings Port, at the same time, with Asdrubal. This would haue been very dangerous to him, had he been descried by his Enemies further at Sea: but in the Hauen they forbare to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captaines of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would haue brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himselfe, by want of such Commission from the Senate. Hee feasted them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into Couenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A Duell betweene two Spanish Princes. A digression, concerning Duells.

Scipio returning into Spaine, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeere, vpon those of Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, as hath beene said before. The Conquest of the Countrie being then in a manner at an end; hee performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memorie of his Father and Vncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at sharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that hee should trouble himselfe with preparing slaues for that spectacle, to hazard their liues, as was vsed in the Citie of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered themselues as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes; to giue proofe in single combat, of the valour that was in their seuerall Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decision of their Controuersies, to trial of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbis and Orsua, Cosen-germans: that contended for the principality of a Towne called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house; after the manner of our Irish Tanistrie. But the father of Orsua stood latelie seized of the Principality: which though himselfe receiued by the death of his elder brother; yet this his sonne would not let it goe backe; but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his father, & old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio haue compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had alreadie laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell; and that neither God, nor Man, but onely Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire betweene them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the foole-hardinesse of the yonger.

Such combats haue beene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy; by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two more at the Warre of Troy, the one betweene Paris and Menelaus, the other, betweene Hector and Aiax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that betweene Dauid and Goliah; and others performed by some of Dauids worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betweene twelue of the Tribe of Iuda, and as many of the Beniamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatij, against the three brethren Curatij that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Coruinus with two Champions of the Gaules, which challenged any Roman; were of lesse importance, as hauing only reference to brauerie. In England there was a great Combat fought betweene Edmond Ironside and Canutus the Dane, for no lesse matter than the Kingdome. The vse of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almost vpon euery occasion, great or small. In the reigne of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mountfort against the Earle of Bloys contending for the Duchie of Brittaine; there was a fight, for honor of the Nations, betweene thirtie of the Britons, and thirtie English: two of which English, were Caluerlie a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his bloud, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them haue bin combats of brauerie, and of gayeté de cœur, as the French terme it; for honour of seuerall Nations; for loue of Mistresses; or whatsoeuer else gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out themselues. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon accusation for life; or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which we spake euen now, betweene Corbis and Orsua. Vnto these (me thinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that betweene Dauid and Goliah; or that betweene the Horatij and Curatij: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is aduentured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life, there was a com-

An. 21. Ric. 2. bat appointed betweene the Lord Henrie of Boulinbrooke Duke of Hereford, and Moubray

An. 3. Rich. 2. Duke of Norfolke. There was a combat performed by Sir Iohn Ansley and one Cattrington: whom Ansley charged with treason: and proued it vpon him by being victorious.

An. 9. Henr. 2. The like was fought betweene Robert of Mountfort, and Henrie of Essex. The like also, between a Nauarrois, & one Welch of Grimsby, whom the Nauarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belied him; and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battell doe determine, that the false accuser, if he bee vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had beene due to the offender, if the accusation had beene proued; I cannot affirme. But wee euery where finde, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by death) be ouercome, Hee shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramor and Low, or offered to do, in the reigne of Queene Elizabeth. And in this case, hee that is beaten, or yeeldeth, loseth onely his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauerie; but in Campe close, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was so ordinarie in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the faire his grand-child, as euery Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lord, made their profit here-

* Si homines de Loraico Vadia Duelli temerè dederint, &c. by. For in the * Memorialls of the Chamber of Accompts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings sixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the partie vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelue shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vse when as any man hath had an hard or vniust iudgement; saying, That hee was tried by the Law of Loray, or Bern; ou le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trials by battaile, that great learned man Yuo, Bishop of Chartres, did often complain, and specially against the French Church-men: as appeares by * his letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Archbishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the iudgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this libertie and kinde of triall, was retrenched by S. Lewes, and Philip the faire; so that no man could decree, or grant it, saue the King himselfe. It hath since been granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings; as to the Lord of Carouges against Iaques le Gris; and to Iulian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro, his Countriman: wherein Sir Henrie Knevet, Father of the Lord Knevet now liuing, was Patron to Romero that had the victorie; and lastly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those Challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deseruing death, (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ces deffenses per vne dementir; The defendant was bound to plead not guiltie, by giuing the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did taisiblement confesser le crime; silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French King, vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the fift, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: euerie pettie Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giuing of the Lie mortalitie it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glorie, to haue it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperor Charles the fift had patiently endured.

From this beginning is deriued a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of these occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Obiection and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe so many Duells, as are founded vpon meere priuate Anger, yea or vpon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein euery man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly libertie, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats; the giuing of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation onely in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrells. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so vnpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the bloud of him that giues it. Thus the fashion, taken vp in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the patterne of their King, is growne to be a custome: whence we haue deriued a kinde of Art and Philosophie of quarrell; with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many no lesse ridiculous) some so mysticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receiue from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one, hauing relation to a slaue; the other to a souldier. I confesse that the difference is pretty: though for my own part, if I had had any such Italianated enemie in former times, I should willingly haue made with him such an exchange; and haue giuen him the point of honour to boot.

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiuing it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that giue it them, vse nothing so much in their conuersation and course of life, as to speake and sweare falsly. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, hauing assumed & sworne to pay the monies & other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them that are not Lyers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Iustice, vpon breach of word, or bond? For he which hath promised that he will pay money by a day; or promised any thing else, wherein hee faileth; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promise hath beene made. Nay, what is the profession of loue that men make now-a-daies? What is the vowing of their seruice; and of all they haue, vsed in their ordinarie complements, and (in effect) to euery man whom they bid but good-morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and court-like kinde of lying? It is (saith a wise French-man, deriding therein the Apish custome of his Countrie) vne marché & complot fait ensemble se mocquer, mentir, & piper les vns les autre; A kinde of merchandise, and complot made among them, to mock, belie, and deride each other: and so farre now-a-daies in fashion, and in vse; as he that vseth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference betweene these mannerly and complementall lies, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessity vpon breach of promise; and those which men vse out of cowardise and feare: the latter confessing themselues to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other stiled the most villanous. But now for the Lie it selfe, as it is made the subiect of all our deadly quarrells in effect: to it I say, That whosoeuer giueth another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainously taken, than to tell him, hee hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promiseth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that hee will performe it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other side, He that giues any man the Lie, when he himselfe knowes that he, to whom it is giuen, hath not lied; doth therein giue the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause haue I, if I say that the Sunne shines when it doth shine, and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's midnight; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himselfe a foolish Ruffian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that giues the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life; giues it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not denie but it is an extreame rudenesse to taxe any man in publike with an vntruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his preiudice against whom the vntruth is vttered:) but all that is rude, ought not to bee ciuilized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsaile of God. But you will say, that these discourses sauour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize to feare God or Hell: whereas he that is truly wise, and truly valiant, knowes that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies sword, we shall finde ten thousand seuen-penie-men (waged at that price in the wars) that feare it as little, or perchance lesse, then any profest Sword-man in the world. Diligentissima in tutela sui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preseruer of it selfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocritie betweene doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pœna: sic neo fortem pugna; sed causa; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which, whosoeuer shall resoluedly end his life, resoluedly in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrie: as hee may iustly bee numbred among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious hearts, in priuate combats, be called the Martyrs of the Deuill. Neither doe wee indeed take our owne reuenge, or punish the iniuries offered vs, by the death of the iniurious. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to giue him, of whom we would be reuenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death vpon our owne consciences; Animasq; in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our soules in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne in generous and noble spirits the defence of their honors, being prest with iniuries? I say that I doe not; if the iniuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; do fauour him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the Assailant. You will secondlie aske me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honor to satisfie the challenger in priuate combat? I answer that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directlie contrarie and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion ouer it, which can iudge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Acts honourable, where the Hang-man giues the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land haue appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror; and the Laws of God appointed the Deuill to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, and a foole, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England & other Christian Kings, haue seldome taken any such aduantage ouer men of quality; who vpon euen termes haue slaine their priuate enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they haue not often done it; so did our Noble-men & Gentlemen in former ages, in all important iniuries, sue vnto the King, to approue themselues by battaile and publique combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law; so did they disdaine to submit themselues vnto the shamefull reuenge thereof; the same reuenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-purse or other Theeues:

Nay

Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for ſuch offenders; Yet is not the Man-ſlaier freed by his pardon. For theſe two remedies hath the partie grieued notwithſtanding, that is, to require iuſtice by Grand Aſſize, or by battaile, vpon his appeale, which (ſaith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denied; and hee further ſaith (for I vſe his owne words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man-ſlaier) be conuinced either by Great Aſſize or by Battaile, vpon that appeale; the Man-ſlaier ſhall die, notwithſtanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (ſaith the ſame learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to iuſtice, and to the puniſhment of blood violently ſhed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men and Gentle-men ſhall be repaired in honor, where an enemie taking the ſtart either in words or blowes, ſhall lay on them an infamie vnſufferable? I ſay that a Marſhalls Court will eaſily giue ſatisfaction in both. And if wee hold it no diſgrace to ſubmit our ſelues for the recouery of our Debts, Goods, & Lands, and for all things elſe, by which the liues of our ſelues, our wiues, and children, are ſuſtained, to the Iudges of the Law; becauſe it may be fellonie, to take by violence euen that which is our owne: why ſhould wee not ſubmit our ſelues vnto the Iudges of honour in caſes of honour; becauſe to recouer our reputation by ſtrong hand, may be murder? But yet againe it may bee obiected, That the loſſe of honour ought to bee much more fearefull vnto vs, than either the loſſe of our goods, of our lands, or of our liues; and I ſay ſo too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeed, and that which ought to be ſo deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of hiſtorie, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publike good? In theſe he that is imployed and truſted, if hee faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other baſe affection; it is true that he loſeth his honor. But the acting of a priuate combate, for a priuate reſpect, and moſt commonly a friuolous one, is not an action of vertue; becauſe it is contrarie to the law of God, and of all Chriſtian Kings: neither is difficult; becauſe euen and equall in perſons and armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrarie; becauſe the loſſe or mutilation of an able man, is alſo a loſſe to the Commonweale.

Now that a Marſhall of England hath power to ſaue euery mans fame and reputation; as farre as reputation may ſuſtaine iniurie by words; I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any euill words that wee haue giuen, and to confeſſe that wee haue done him wrong vnto whom wee haue giuen them, is a ſufficient ſatisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than ſufficient. For he that giues ill words in choller, and ſuddenly denies them, or repents himſelfe of them vpon aduiſement; hath the diſaduantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeed not to be giuen but to thoſe that are ſeruile, whether ſufficient recompence will be made for them, it ſhall appeare by a notable example of a moſt worty Gentleman Monſieur de Pleſsis, that was ſtricken in France not long ſince by a Baron of the ſame Nation. The ſatisfaction which was giuen him by a iudgement of the Conſtable and Marſhalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Conſtable gaue iudgement, M. de Pleſsis was ſet in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Conſtable and Marſhalls ſate: the Baron, who had giuen him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a ſword with the point towards himſelfe, and in his left hand the like cudgel or baſtinado, wherewith he had ſtricken M. de Pleſsis; both which weapons he deliuered into Pleſsis hands, ſubmitting himſelfe to ſuch reuenge, as it ſhould pleaſe him to take with either of thoſe weapons; the Conſtable and Marſhalls hauing formerly left it to the will of Pleſsis, to vſe his owne diſcretion in the reuenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reaſon to pleaſe himſelfe, as one beforehand in point of honor, who ſtruck M. de Pleſsis, like a Ruffian comming behinde him, and (hauing the aduantage of companie, and his horſes readie) ſhifted himſelfe away on the ſodaine, but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himſelfe in this ſhamefull manner: or whether Monſieur de Pleſsis (of whoſe valour no man doubted) had not farre iuſter cauſe to reſt ſatisfied, ſince he might at his pleaſure haue beaten or wounded his enemie, but forgaue him: let any wiſe man iudge. To this if it be ſaid, That the Baron was conſtrained to make his ſubmiſſion; that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntarie; and therefore no diſgrace vnto him: I anſwere, that one may ſay as well, that it is no diſgrace to a Theefe, when hee is brought to the Gallowes, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, becauſe his repentance alſo is conſtrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no disgrace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sinnes to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for somewhat vnworthy of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay, voluntarie repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weakenesse. Certainelie, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride pettie iniuries or suddaine iniuries, that are not offered from malice forethought, than reuenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their owne valor; and rather desire, that thereby the world should beleeue them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselues. For hee that knowes himselfe indeed to be an honest man, scornes to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France haue, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose iudgement, in all disputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preserued; we may therefore as well submit our selues to the Iudge of honour in all disputes of honour, as we doe submit our selues in all controuersies of liuelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Cheualrie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lesse charitable than politike. For the bloud of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth honie-bees, as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Reuenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten vp of seuerall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatning the wrath of God vpon supreme Gouernours, than the permission.

His Maiestie therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France also endeuored) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deede in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessors could neuer doe: in beating down, and extinguishing, that hereditarie prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conquest, which shall giue him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for euer-more. And we haue cause to hope, that his royall care shall bee no lesse happy in preuenting the like mischiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outragious vanitie of Duellists.

Vnto this that I haue spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or lesse, in their seuerall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lies; and such pernicious lies, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vttered by false witnesses: the former sort, being excusable by weakenesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betweene killing of a man in open field, with euen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per insidias; though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priuiledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer be drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is euery guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by ouert violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poysoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betweene comming presumptuously vpon a man, to slay him with guile; and lying in wait for bloud, priuily, for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Maiesty now reigning, haue giuen notable testimonie of their iustice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talard: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporté de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and supported by diuers great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especiall fauor with the King) was one, was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the hands of the Hangman. Queen Marie, vpon a nobleman of her own Religion, and in many other respects very deare vnto her. His Maiesty, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans, euery Age hath had too many examples. Of killing guilefully by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Iudge) the Author of the French Recherches giues vnto vs two notable instances: the one of des Eſhars; who (saith Pasquire) fit mourir Montaign grand Maistre de France, pour contenter l' opinion de celuy dont il estoit lors idolastre; & Dieu permit que depuis

Who cauſed Mantaigu great Maſter of France to die, to content his minde (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Eſtars worſhipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himſelfe was ſoone after hanged and ſtrangled. The other was of the Great Francis the firſt, vpon his Chancellor Poyet: who to ſatisfie the Kings paſſion, practiſed the deſtruction of the Admirall Chabot, a man moſt nobly deſcended, and of great ſeruice. For as in other men, ſo in Kings, the paſſion of loue growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, he charged him with ſome offences which he had formerly committed. The Admirall, preſuming vpon the great good ſeruice which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marſeilles againſt the Emperour; gaue the King other language than became him; and deſired nothing ſo much, as a publike triall. Hereupon the King (it being eaſie to prouoke an ill diſpoſition) gaue commiſſion to the Chancellor, as Preſident, and other Iudges, vpon an information of the Kings Aduocate, to queſtion the Admirals life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, & of a large conſcience, (which is not rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with ſome of the Iudges with ſo great cunning; with others, with ſo ſharpe threats; and with the reſt, with ſo faire promiſes; as albeit nothing could be proued againſt the Admirall, worthy of the Kings diſpleaſure; yet the Chancellor ſubſcribed, and got others to ſubſcribe, to the forfeiture of his Eſtate, Offices, and Libertie; though not able to preuaile againſt his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falſhood in ſo great a Magiſtrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignement, and condemnation? Belle lecon certes (ſaith Paſquier) à tout Iuge pour demourer touſiours en ſoy, & ne laiſſer fluctuer ſa conſcience dedans les vagues d'vne imaginarie faueur, qui pour fin de ieu le ſubmerge; A faire leſſon to all Iudges, to dwell alwaies in themſelues, and not to ſuffer their conſciences to float vpon the waues of imaginarie fauour, which in the end ouerwhelmes them. And as for the Admirall: though it might haue beene anſwered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as vndeſerued, That hee was tryed, according to his owne deſire, by the Lawes of his Countrey, and by the Iudges of Parliament; yet the Kings iuſtice, ſurmounting all other his paſſions, gaue backe vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Eſtate.

†. III.

The laſt Acts of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is choſen Conſul.

THe laſt buſineſſe that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangerouſly ſicke, in ſuch ſort, that the rumor of his death ranne currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, petie Kings, that had forſaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes againſt the Romans. They were vainely perſwaded, that after the Carthaginians were driuen out, they themſelues ſhould become the mightieſt in all Spaine. But ſeeing now, that things were no way anſwerable to the greatneſſe of their hopes; they thought it beſt, to take the preſent aduantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they raſhly fell vpon the Sueſſetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and waſted their Countrie. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Sucro, in ſtead of making head againſt theſe Rebels, grew to be affected with the like diſtemper. They had not reaped ſuch profit of their Roman conqueſts, as might ſatisfie their deſires; or as they thought eaſie to be gotten, if they might be their owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time ſerued very well, to enrich themſelues with the ſpoile of the Countrie. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greateſt of all, driuing away their Colonels, that ſhould haue bridled their furie; they choſe out of their owne number two baſe fellowes, Albius Calenus, and Atrius Vmber, to their Commanders. Theſe tooke vpon them all the Enſignes of Proconſuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had beene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was choſen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipio's. But whileſt they were deuiſing, what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themſelues, in a time of ſuch combuſtion as was expected; there arriued more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came alſo new Colonels, ſent vnto them from their Generall: who mildely rebuking their want of conſideration, and ſeeming to be glad that they had no further ouer-ſhot themſelues; led them to Carthagena, there to receiue their pay. Before their comming, Scipio had reſolued to doe exemplarie iuſtice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in feare, of what they had deſerued. Therefore hee cauſed Syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition againſt Mandonius; and Indibilis; Hee cauſed Albius and Atrius with ſome thirtie other of their Complices, to be ſecretly apprehended in their lodgings; Hee called the Mutiners to aſſembly; and hauing them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpoſe; he bitterly inueighed againſt them all, as Traitors. This done; Albius, and Atrius, with the other priſoners, were haled to the ſtake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman cuſtome toward ſuch offenders. The reſt of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thouſand, were cauſed to take their oath of obedience anew; and receiued euery man his pay when hee was ſworne.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithſtanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could haue beene contented to bee quiet: but by the ſeueritie vſed to the Roman Souldiers, they ſtood in feare, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder meaſure. Scipio went againſt them; and found them in a Valley, that was ſcarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof hee fought with them: and ſending Lelius with all his horſe to fetch a compaſſe about the Hills, & charge them in reare; he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this, no hope remaining to preſerue themſelues and their eſtates, otherwiſe then by making ſubmiſſion. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly crauing pardon, both for himſelfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his requeſt; yet ſo, that they were taught to acknowledge themſelues leſſe free Princes then formerly they had beene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Maſaniſſa; who ſecretly promiſed to do him all ſeruice, if the People of Rome would ſend him to make War in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spaine alone, he ſhould thence depart with his fleet into Italie; and there wage an Armie of Gaules, and Ligurians, to joyne with Hannibal. For this purpoſe, was money ſent vnto him from Carthage; and he himſelfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades; without ſparing either priuate men, the common treaſury, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, he landed at Carthagena; hoping to haue taken it by ſurpriſe. But he failed in the attempt; and was ſo beaten to his ſhips, that he returned backe to repoſe himſelfe a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and ſpoyle that hee had made at his taking leaue of them, would not ſuffer him againe to enter into their Citie. By this he foreſaw, that it would not be long ere they became Roman. Wherfore ſending Meſſengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vncourteous dealing, he allured their Magiſtrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithſtanding all the excuſe that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, hee followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Iſle and Citie of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, preſently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer vp the Prouince, to thoſe that were ſent from Rome to ſucceede him therein: and himſelfe with ten ſhips returned home. At his comming to Rome he made ſuite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denyed him: for that it had as yet beene granted vnto no Proconſul; excepting to ſuch, as receiued that dignitie after a Conſulſhip, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulſe: the election of new Conſuls being then in hand, by generall voice of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was choſen Conſul; and P. Licinius Craſſus joyned with him. This Craſſus, being high Prieſt, or Biſhop of the Romans; might not, by the cuſtome of thoſe times, go farre frō the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their ſuperſtition: though Caſar, and others, who in ages following held the ſame Office; were ſtayed by no ſuch religious impediment, from being farre, and long abſent. Hereby it came to paſſe, that Scipio deſiring to haue the warre tranſferred into Africk, was in no danger to loſe that honourable charge, by any miſchance of lot, in the diuiſion of Prouinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment ſo farre off.

§. XVIII.

Scipio obtaines leaue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of Masaniſſa who was ioyned with Scipio. The victories againſt Asdrubal and Syphax.

Pub. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Craſſus, entring into their Conſulſhip, helda meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio ſhould bee allowed, to beſtow part of the money which hee had brought out of Spaine into the treaſurie; vpon the ſetting forth of ſolemne plaies, that he had vowed to make, whileſt hee was buſied in his Spaniſh warres. This helped well to reuiue the memorie of his victories already gotten; and to giue hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which hee intended to make in Africk. To the ſame purpoſe, did the Spaniſh Embaſſages auaile much in the Senate, eſpecially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deſeruedly; ſaying, That they were the moſt happy of all their Countrimen, ſince they being preſent, had ſeene him choſen Conſul, and ſhould carry home ſuch joyfull newes. The Saguntine Embaſſadoures were louingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though coſtly it were both to them, and to the Romanes, had well deſerued. Neuertheleſſe, when Scipio propoſed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Prouince: there wanted not many, euen of the principall men, that vehemently gainſaid him. Of theſe was Q. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who ſeemes to haue bene troubled with that diſeaſe; which too often cauſeth men renowned for long approoued vertue, to looke aſquint vpon the actions of thoſe, that follow them in the ſame kinde. Hee alleaged many reaſons againſt the purpoſe of the Conſul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treaſurie was vnable to ſuſtaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard ſo great forces, where they could not at pleaſure bee recalled vnto the defence of Rome it ſelfe, if need required. Hereunto hee added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy ſtood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as alſo concerning the honour of the Conſul; which would (he ſaid) be greater in ſetting Italy free from enemies, then it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to eleuate the Spaniſh warres, as of leſſe moment than the intended voiage againſt Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for hauing ſuffered Asdrubal to paſſe into Italy: ſhewing, that it was greatly to be feared, leſt the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithſtanding the good ſucceſſe of Scipio (if it hapned to be good) might be ſent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilſt the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which hee vrged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yere a Prouince: which the Conſul neuertheleſſe propounded in ſuch wiſe, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other ſide, inſiſted vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offenſiue, than a defenſiue warre: eſpecially againſt ſuch as the Carthaginians; who being ill prouided of able men at home, did furniſh themſelues by helpe of money, with leuies made abroad. As for the care of Italie, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would be as well able to diſcharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promiſing to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home: and taxing as ciuilly as hecould, the enuy of Fabius, which withſtood ſuch a gallant enterpriſe; he propoſed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding: for aſmuch as it was noyſed abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who reſented in this honourable man a little ſpice of that arrogancie, which in following ages, grew to bee much hotter in thoſe that had commanded long abroad. But in concluſion, Scipio referred himſelfe wholly vnto the Senates good will and pleaſure; whereby he obtained thus much, That the Iſle of Sicil might be appointed vnto him for his Prouince; with leaue to paſſe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voiage, made the Roman Senate haue little care to furniſh out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africke. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, comming on the ſuddaine from the Baleares to Genua, and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no leſſe terrible inuaſion vpon Italy, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. Hee could not indeed raiſe any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that hee found them diſtracted with ciuill warres. Therefore hee was driuen to make choice of his partie; and to helpe those whom he thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly haue spared; yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the vnsteady Gaule, redie to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that vnder Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay ready to bee employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet either comming to his ayde from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is vncertaine) loaden with the booty that he had taken; fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that gouerned in Sardinia. This did much disable him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, heartning him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which he found, and that fatall voiage of Scipio into Africke, disturbed all; and made him bee recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians haue beene pleased to take notice. Onely it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greeke letters. Such accompt of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesnesse; in those that are vpon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of deiection, when they finde a notable change. A great pestilence, infesting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is said to haue beene the occasion of this yeeres idlenesse, which fell out not much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was maruailously empouerished by this warre; and had already tried the vtmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargaine, that the Citie might receiue no losse; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to make presse of Souldiers for his African voiage; neither did he ouer-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselues; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is vsually found in Councels of estate, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carrie all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne iudgements, to the wisedome that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde himselfe deceiued: the counsaile of those many being wholly directed by the empire of a few, that ouer-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature sorted well with the busines, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fuluius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne olde in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from diuers parts of Italie about seuen thousand Voluntaries. Hee had also prouision from the seuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canuas for sailes, Axes, Beede-hookes, Hand-milles, and the like implements, Firre for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmets, & Speares of all kindes: euery place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could afoord.

Vnto this willingnesse of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of fiue and fortie dayes, he had both feld his Timber, built, and lanched twentie Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith he transported his Armie into Sicil. In Sicil hee found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had serued at Canna: which were olde Souldiers, and (as he himselfe well knew) not guilty of the ouerthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heauy censure. They had serued vnder Marcellus and Leuinus, at the taking of many Cities, and strong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good vse to him in Africk, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthie yong men, and such as loued well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly highly to their contentment: but with condition that they should deliuer their Horse and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whilst he was prouiding, to haue things in a readines for Africk, the banished Locrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recouer their Citie. Some handicrafts me, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri (for there were two in the Towne) being take prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed, & rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gaue order to haue the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadell was surprised. The other Citadell was stronglydefeded by the Carthaginian Garriso, which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest their owne paucitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Consul Scipio. The Townesmen were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclininng to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the comming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Cittadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians vnto the Roman Senate; not onely against those of the Garrison: but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies: the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctitie, was spoyled by these barbarous Theeues. The Locrians therefore aduised the Senate to make present amends to the goddesse for this sacriledge: saying, that the like had neuer beene committed, without notorious reuenge by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good eare to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the iniuries done vnto them; sent for Pleminius, with other principall the offendors, whom they cast into prison, and vsed according to their deserts: as also they restored vnto Proserpina her money twice told. But olde Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. Hee laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Locri; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharpe inuectiue that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the dissolutenesse of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindfull of any seruice toward, nor fit for it if neede should require. Finally, things were so farre vrged, that tenne Legates were sent ouer into Sicil, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italie, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his iourney, and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employed Lælius in Africk; rather to make discouerie, than to worke any other great effect of warre. Hee tooke a great bootie: and strucke no little terrour into the Carthaginians; who saw their affaires to be vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his iourney was, That speaking with Masanissa, he well informed himselfe of the state of Africk; and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to ioyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa his reuolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made vnder-hand with the Romans: Liuie doth professe, That there was no such euident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change, was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inferiour to Liuie, both in Worth and Time) giues one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary trueth. Onely the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe; that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Liuie, if it had beene true: vnlesse we should beleeue, that he wilfully forbare to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. Howsoeuer it was, thus * Appian tels it: and many circumstances of things done, confirme it. Asdrubal, the sonne of Giseo, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masanissa loued. Masanissa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to bee his sonne-in law.

Liu. l. 38.

When

When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, hee went into Spaine, and there did great ſeruice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Aſdrubals daughter to be a matter of State: and beſtowed her vpon Syphax; without ſtanding to acquaint her father or Maſaniſſa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mightie Prince; and for that the indignitie of the repulſe, had made him become their enemie. Hereof Maſaniſſa was aduertiſed: and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, ſecretly as hee thought; yet not ſo ſecretly, but ſome notice was taken of it: which would haue coſt him his life, had he not with great circumſpection conueighed himſelfe home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may beleeue Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things paſt, and following. Onely it ſeemes, that howſoeuer Sophoniſba the daughter of Aſdrubal, was promiſed by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax: yet ſince this their courteſie proceeded from feare, Hee thought it wiſedome to continue and increaſe the ſame their feare, by making faire promiſes to the Romans; vntill Aſdrubal had ſent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was conſummated. In other matters concerning the warre it ſelfe, wherein Appian differs much from Liuie, and from Polybius, whom (as appeares by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Liuie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports.

Liu. lib. 29.

Maſaniſſa was the ſonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whoſe father dying, the Crown deſcended by order of the Country, vnto Deſalces the brother, not vnto Maſaniſſa the ſonne. But this Vncle of Maſaniſſa ſhortly dyed: and his elder ſonne, who tooke poſſeſſion of the Kingdome, was vanquiſhed, and ſlaine in battaile by a Rebel, that made himſelfe Protector ouer the yonger which was a childe. The Traitor fortified himſelfe againſt Maſaniſſa, whoſe returne hee feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not ſerue: Hee, and his Pupill, were diſpoſſeſſed of their Eſtates by Maſaniſſa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reaſon ſhould haue beene glad, that Maſaniſſa, who had done them notable ſeruice, was thus confirmed in his Eſtate: had they not beene guiltie of the iniurie by them done vnto him; whilſt his Vncle or Couſin reigned, and he ſeemed vnlikely to ſtand them in any ſtead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne malice towards his Corriual, warred vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuertheleſſe Maſaniſſa ſtill retained the hearts of his people: and thereby remained ſtrong enough, to infeſt both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though hee was often put in diſtreſſe, by great forces that were ſent againſt him. He therefore keeping much about the leſſer Syrtis, between the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the comming of the Romans: yet ſo, as he made long roades ouer all the Countrey, euen as farre as to Hippo; and when Lalius arriued thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to haſten on Scipio to the inuaſion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whoſe great aide and ſuccour was repoſed more hope of good ſucceſſe, than could bee expected from the good will of poore Maſaniſſa; ſent an Embaſſage into Sicil about the ſame time, which was little pleaſing vnto Scipio. He excuſed himſelfe of his promiſe lately made: and ſignified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not chooſe but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein hee was borne and reigned; and for the defence of his beloued wiues Countrie, if it were inuaded. Neuertheleſſe he promiſed to remaine a Neuter; ſo long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This meſſage haſtened Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perſwaſion could haue done. For the promiſed aſſiſtance of Syphax had not a little aduanced his enterpriſe; in procuring both the aſſent of the Senate, and the forwardneſſe of many Aduenturers. Leſt therefore the fayling of this hope, ſhould worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the beſt way to preuent all diſcourſe, and ſet the warre vndertaken immediatly on foot. The Embaſſadours he diſmiſſed in all haſte, with letters to their King: wherein he willed him to conſider, that what hee had promiſed, hee had alſo ſworne; and therefore ſhould doe well to make it good. Hauing ſent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make readie for the voyage; which hee intended no longer to deferre. For, ſaide hee, Maſaniſſa hath beene with Lalius: and Syphax hath newly ſent to me; greatly wondring vpon what I ſhould thus ſtay; and ſaying, That they will prouide for themſelues, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale preuented all further inquisition, that might else haue beene made concerning the message of these Embassadors; whose followers had beene seene walking vp and downe Syracuse. And lest any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the businesse, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet vnto Lilybæum: and requesting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Prætor in Sicil, to meete him there; hasted thither with his Armie. At Lilybæum he agreed with the Prætor, about the diuision of the Legions between them; which to leaue behinde for defence of the Iland; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certaine: some Historians reckoning onely ten thousand foot, and two and twentie hundred horse; others increasing them to fiue and thirtie thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them down: since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither hee, when hee tooke his voyage into Spaine, nor others vpon like occasions, haue omitted; they being also word for word set downe by an Historian, who borrowed them from Liuie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Armie landed in Africk, neere to a Fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely affirme; because it is vncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The comming of Masanissa vnto Scipio at his first arriuall, helpes to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinks the faire Promontorie to haue been the same, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficultie Masanissa might come thither frō the lesser Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment soone after his arriuall, Scipio encamped before Vtica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo; whence the way to Vtica was not long. This is also strongly proued; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, fiue hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roued about the Countrie with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which hee vsually resorted, like as before hee had met with Lælius at Hippo that was farther off; as it would haue beene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouer-come the trouble of a long iourney, and fetch a great compasse to Vtica, by Land; when hee might haue disembarqued nearer vnto it. Neuertheless it may passe as a coniecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the lesser Syrtis; since he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybæum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustenance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well prouided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masanissa had signified vnto Lælius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoeuer they made braue promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee saw their fleet and Army to bee such, as not onely serued to inuade the Lands of Carthage, but threatned a conquest of the Citie, and whole Estate: then might he better aduise them to ser sayle for Vtica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were leuied, or to be leuied in haste. Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, the same that had lately beene chased out of Spaine by Scipio was their best man of warre. And good enough perhaps hee was thought by Hanno and his fellowes, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passeable. He was then with the King his son-in law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax & to him, informing them of the Inuasion: entreating the one of them to giue assistance, and commanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citie, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and slaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which hee conueighed aboord his Hulks or ships of burden, and ſent them backe loaden into Sicil. He tooke likewiſe a Towne called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thouſand Numidian horſe: whoſe ſeruice being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceiue the vnskilfulneſſe of their Leader, that had thus houſed them. Wherefore he ſent Maſaniſſa before him: who rode vp to the gates; and, by making a brauado, trained out the improuident Hanno ſo farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victory was eaſily gotten, and Hanno either taken, or ſlaine. With thoſe that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the towne, which preſently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a Citty of great importance, *of which mention hath beene formerly made, and ſate downe before it. Forty dayes he ſpent about it, aſſayling it both by Land and Sea, and vſing all his engines of battery whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of preuayling. And now the Summer was quite ſpent: ſo that it was time for him to chooſe a place, and fortifie his Winter-Campe, which muſt be well ſtored againſt the yeare following. Whileſt thus neceſſity vrged him to leaue Vtica: and ſhame of taking the repulſe in his firſt great enterpriſe, rather than any hope of better ſucceſſe, cauſed him to ſtay there: Aſdrubal and Syphax gaue him the honour of a faire pretence to leaue the ſiege. Aſdrubal had made a Leuie of thirty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe: yet aduentured not with this ill-trained Army to draw neare vnto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage fifty thouſand foot, and tenne thouſand horſe: which ioyning vnto the forces of Aſdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occaſion to diſ-lodge. He choſe for his Winter-campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Nauie. His foot-men hee lodged on a Promontorie, ioyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horſe-men hee beſtowed vpon lower ground, on the other ſhoare: in the bottome of the Creeke he moted his ſhips; and there he quartered the mariners, with all that belonged vnto the Fleet. The whole campe he ſtrongly fortified, and ſo attended the ſeaſon of the yeare, when it ſhould ſerue him againe to fight. Of cattaile and other bootie Maſaniſſa had brought in great ſtore, by driuing the Countrey, before the comming of Aſdrubal and Syphax. Corne alſo hee had gotten ſome: and great ſtore was ſent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewiſe apparrell for his Souldiers, was ſent from home, or from Sardinia: though ſcarce enough to ſerue turne, for that it was a matter of more coſt. The ſhippes that brought theſe things, he freighted homewards with ſuch part of his booty, as he could beſt ſpare, eſpecially with captiues to be ſold for ſlaues. Aſdrubal and Syphax encamped neare vnto Scipio: not ſo ſtrongly fortifying themſelues, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the ſeuere inſtitution, which the Romans vſed in the diſcipline of warre, or for that they preſumed vpon their multitude, againſt which they found in Scipio no diſpoſition to iſſue foorth of his ſtrength, and fight. So the Winter paſſed without action.

Lib. 2. ſect. 3.

When Spring drew neare, Scipio thought it good to aſſay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhappes hee might be wonne by perſwaſions to forſake the Carthaginians. It was conſidered, that thoſe Barbarians were naturally vnconſtant; and particularly, that Syphax had giuen proofe before this of his much leuitie. It might therefore be hoped, That hauing wearied himſelfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Camp: and being peraduenture no leſſe weary with ſatiety of his wife, who had cauſed him to enter into this warre: he might be moued with a little entreatie to withdraw himſelfe home into his Kingdome, and reſt a Neuter. But it is not vnlikely, that ſuch a friend as this King, had beene highly entertained and honoured in the Citty of Carthage, which was neare at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleaſed him, or as he had beene inuited, to make a ſtep thither and repoſe himſelfe a while: his wife Queene Sophonisba lying alſo there at the ſame time, to cheriſh him in his reſolution. Howſoeuer it were, Syphax did onely make an ouerture of peace: propounding it as reaſonable, That Hannibal ſhould be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like ſort ſhould quietly depart out of Africke, and ſo make an end of the warre: wherewith now both Africke and Europe were diſquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the firſt giue eare: yet being preſſed earneſtly by many meſſages from Syphax, and deſiring to continue the inter-courſe of Embaſſadors; he began to make ſhew, as if he would conſider of the motion. He was giuen to vnderſtand by thoſe whom he had ſent vnto the king, That the Enemies had their campes without any great defence of earth, full of woodden Cabbins, bins, and couered with boughes: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed couerings of Mattes and Reedes; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaues: vnder which they lay carelesly without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement hee bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to set their campes on fire, and thereby giue them a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, he fore-saw that it would be a worke of great difficulty for him, to proceede in his warres when time should serue. It was a plaine open Countrey wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, vpon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought vpon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt vpon their Campe. To this end he sent many Embassadours, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeede of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended surprise. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many olde Souldiers disguised like slaues; that wandering (as it were) idlely vp and downe the Campe, might obserue the wayes and entrances, with whatsoeuer else was needefull. When he had learned as much as he desired: vpon the sudden he sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of warre; without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, hee might put his designe in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Asdrubal and Syphax were very pensiue; as hauing lately perswaded themselues, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they beganne to deuise, by what arte they might draw Scipio out of his Campe, and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe, they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refusall of peace, as did Marcus Atilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him? which they themselues were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian fleete should doe by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselues; recompencing (in conceipt) the losse of their hopes past, with that of victory to come. But herein they were extreamly and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they prouided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to doe somewhat against Vtica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appoynted to take the same peece of ground, whereon he lay against Vtica before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to haue notice of it; partly to hinder those of Vtica from setting vpon the few, that he purposed to leaue behinde him in his Campe. He caused his men that night to suppe well, and betimes; that they might be ready for the iourney. After supper, he appoynted such Companies as hee thought fit, to the defence of his Campe; all the rest of the army he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seauen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his army; the other halfe he committed to Lælius and Masanissa, whom he sent before him to set vpon the campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to haue taken hold by casualty vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the camp of Asdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies, and giue Syphax warning to look to himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and softly; that Lælius and Masanissa, who had a longer iourney, and were to fetch a compasse about for feare of being discouered, might haue time to get before him, & do their feat. It was about two or three of the clocke in the morning, when the campe of Syphax began to blaze: which not onely the Numidians, but their King himselfe, imputed vnto casualty; as thinking themselues safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betweene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe asleepe; and others, that had sitten vp late at drinking, ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But so great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly vnderstand in what case they were, nor giue any remedie to the mischance, as it was ſuppoſed. Many were ſmothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the ſudden miſchiefe, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that eſcaped the fire, fell vpon the enemies ſword, which was ready to receiue them. Eſpecially Maſaniſſa, that beſt knew the Country, did great execution vpon them; hauing layd all the wayes, by which hee foreſaw that they would ſeeke to eſcape. The Carthaginians perceiuing this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull miſchance: ſo that ſome ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians, carrying onely what would ſerue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart: where, feareleſſe of any danger towards themſelues, they ſtood beholding the greatneſſe of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would haue it. He therefore loſt no time: but ſetting vpon thoſe that were running towards the Numidians, he killed ſome, and purſued the reſt backe into their campe, which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Aſdrubal ſeeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not ſtand to make reſiſtance, but ſhifted onely for himſelfe, and eſcaped with a few of his horſe about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had beene taken in ſuch a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would haue iudged him worthy to be crucified. It would then haue beene ſayd, that with leſſe than one halfe of thirty thouſand men, hee might at leaſt haue giuen ſome bad recompence, to them that were taking paines in kindling theſe fires, had he not beene only carefull how to ſaue his owne fearefull head. Neuertheleſſe Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is moſt likely to haue beene true, That if Aſdrubal, or any of thoſe about him, would haue ſtriuen to ſhew valour, when the Campe was once on fire: He ſhould not thereby haue done any manner of good, becauſe of the tumult and conſternation. I ſhall not need to tell what a fearefull thing it was, to heare the cries of ſo many thouſands that periſhed by fire and ſword, or to beholde the cruell flame that conſumed them; which (as Polybius affirmes) none that hath being is able to deſcribe. It is enough to ſay, That of thoſe many thouſands very few did eſcape; which accompanied Aſdrubal and Syphax in their ſeuerall wayes of flight. Beſides theſe alſo there were ſome ſcatterers, eſpecially of the Numidians, that ſaued themſelues in the darke: but they were not many, as after ſhall appeare. Surely it muſt needs haue beene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwiſe made away, and what numbers eſcaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Liuie, who in the reſt of this Relation, as often elſewhere, doth follow Polybius, may ſeeme to haue followed ſome leſſe worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in caſting vp the ſumme. For hee reckons onely two thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe, to haue eſcaped; forty thouſand to haue periſhed by ſword or fire; and aboue ſixe thouſand to haue bin taken priſoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre ſhort of foure ſcore and thirteene thouſand, which were in theſe two Campes.

Excerpt. e Pol. lib. 14.

Aſdrubal, putting himſelfe into the next towne that was very ſtrongly fortified, thought there to finde the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good leiſure might repaire their Army. He had with him no more than two thouſand foote, & fiue hundred horſe: which hee thought ſufficient to defend the Towne; if the Towneſ-men would not be wanting to themſelues. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earneſt in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeelde. Vnto this diſputation, he well foreſaw, that the arriuall of Scipio would ſoone giue an end. Wherfore, leſt they ſhould lay hold vpon him, and ſeeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; he ſhrunke away betimes, and made all haſte to Carthage. As for the towne, which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his firſt comming: and thereby preſerued it ſelfe from all manner of loſſe. The two next Townes adioyning would needs be valiant, and make countenance of warre: but their ſtrength not being anſwerable, they were ſoone taken by Scipio, who abandoned them to the pleaſure of his Souldiers. This being done, hee returned to the ſiege of Vtica.

The Carthaginians were ſore troubled, as they had good reaſon; when, in ſtead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of ſuch a lamentable ouerthrow. Neceſſitie enforced them to make haſtie prouiſion for the future: but how to doe it, few of them ſaw any meanes. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to ſend for Hannibal out of Italie; but the moſt, and they which finally preuailed, were of opinion, That notwithſtanding the loſſe of this Armie, they might well defend themselues against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leaue them. It was therefore concluded, That they should bend all their care this way, leuying in all haste an other Armie; and sending Embassadours to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their infortunate Commander, Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, was employed to make new leuies of men: and Queene Sophonisba went forth with Embassadours to her husband Syphax; who hauing gathered together as many as he could of his subiects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne kingdome. Sophonisba laboured so with her husband, that at length she wonne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to serue in Africke. Of these were made such braue reports, as if their courage, and the armes which they vsed, were not to be resisted. Euen the multitude within Carthage beleeued these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole country of Spaine had beene twice conquered; first, by the Carthaginians themselues, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales preuailed much: which the Carthaginian Embassadours helped with a lie; saying, That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty dayes they made vp an Armie, consisting wel-neare of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called The Great Fields, about fiue dayes iourney from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leauing behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Armie, to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three dayes after the meeting of both armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now beene time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius, and seeke to weary out the Enemy by delayes. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worse Commander, or else, it was not in his power to giue such directions as best pleased himselfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, hauing their Italian horse in the right wing; and Masanissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the battaile. The victory was gotten without many blowes: for the vntrayned followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustayne the first charge of the Italians, or of Masanissa. Onely the Spaniards fought a long time, euen vntill they were all in a manner slaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, since they were thus come ouer to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserued of them, than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacy was beneficiall to those that fled; for that it hindred the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal, and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his owne kingdome: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, hauing thus gotten the mastery of the field, tooke counsaile about the prosecution of the warre. It was resolued vpon as the best course, That he himselfe, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masanissa, with his Numidians, and Lælius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdom, where easily else he might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice, it seemes that Masanissa gaue: who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his owne kingdome, vsurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Lælius was sent away with Masanissa: and Scipio stayed behinde, carrying the warre from towne to towne. Many places yeelded for feare; many were taken by force; and all the subiects of Carthage wauered in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vnreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had layd vpon them for maintenance of the warre in Spaine and Italy. What to do in this case the Carthaginians could hardly resolue. Fortune was their Enemy; they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subiects with any violent exaction of men or money; who neuertheless of their owne free will were likely to giue little help. Very much it grieued them to send for Hannibal out of Italy: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embassadours should be forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to set out a fleete against that of Scipio, that rode before Vtica, weakely manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was busied in the Inland Countries. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all meanes the Citty of Carthage: vpon the safety whereof they said all depended: adding, that whilest they were true, and at vnitie among themselues, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counsels were not reiected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the Citty, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuertheless, it was considered, that hereby they should onely protract the warre, without any aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victory, no, though it should fall out, that all the shippes at Vtica might be taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That hee should immediately come ouer into Africke, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselues to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to the fortification of the towne: some, to make ready the Fleet; and some, appoynted thereunto, forthwith to embarque themselues for Italie.

In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a Cittie in those dayes very strong, and standing in prospect almost of euery part of Carthage. This place, or rather some defencible peece adioyning, he easily tooke; the garrison forsaking it, and running away as soone as he drew neare. But whilest he was about there to incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the Citty, he might perceiue the Carthaginian Fleete setting forth, and making towards Vtica: What this meant, he readily conceiued; and stood in great feare, lest his owne ships, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heauily loden with engines of battery, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most conuenient for assaulting the towne) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that speciall seruice. Wherefore he hasted away towards Vtica, to assist with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should haue come too late. Neither could he indeed haue beene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had vsed such diligence as was conuenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Vtica, they tarried a while to make a brauado; presenting themselues in order of battell, as if the Romans would haue put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: he thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserue his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sea; it should little auaile the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his ships of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one behinde another, made a foure-fold bridge ouer the Channell of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessells, might runne out and backe againe vpon any aduantage or need: but these he couered with plankes, vsing the masts and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to ioyne all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it selfe not be torne asunder. Scarce was this worke finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauen. The fight betweene them and the Romans that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood vpon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their gallies, that were lower and vnsteady, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots & long boats, aduenturing forth from behind the Bridge, were greatly ouer-borne by the force of the gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends, that were intangled & mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grapling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. These they threw vpon the masts & yards which serued as arches to ioyne the bridge together: then rowing

ing backwards, they tore all asunder; in such sort, that one ship followed another, and all the first ranke was broken, or defeated. The Defendants had no other way, than to saue themselues as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them vntouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselues any further in this laborious worke: but hauing haled away sixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their wel-come was greater than their victory: because among so many grieuous losses, onely this exploit had succeeded wel; though it were of small importance.

Whilest things thus passed about Carthage, Lælius and Masanissa, in their iourney against Syphax, found as good successe as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masanissa to his kingdome, without farther contention: the Masæsyli, his subiects, ioyfully receiuing him, and forsaking the vsurpers. But here they stayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore, being solicited by Asdrubal and Sophonisba, he prepared againe for warre. But beside the instigation of his beloued wife; the losse of the Masæsyli would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lælius and Masanissa, to giue him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse vnwillingly from that which they haue gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession, be the title vnto some part neuer so vniust. Hereunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that shee had vomited vp her owne guts, when it was onely the garbage of some other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleeued the Kingdome of the Masæsyli to be part of his entrailes: Lælius and Masanissa will shortly giue him somewhat that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King, whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had beene conuerted into strong enmity; as also to set in his place another, who might do them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masanissa knew best, as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, euen to this day, though there be many strong townes, yet the fortune of a battell is enough, to translate the kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Army, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long agoe sent vnto him out of Spaine from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight couragiously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered vp in haste: and few of them had seene warre before. Encamping neare vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small troupes of horse on both sides, encountred one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellowes. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: so that at length Syphax, vnwilling to dis-hearten his men by taking any foyle at their first meeting with the Enemy, came vp with all his horse, which were the best part of his forces, and therewith ouer-charged Masanissa, whose numbers were farre lesse. But whilest he was prosecuting his hope of victory: some Roman squadrons of Foot came against him through their owne Troupes of horse; which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their battaile standing now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though he laboured much in vaine, to make them giue ground. Masanissa likewise, and his Troupes grew confident vpon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to giue backe. Herewithall the Legions came in sight: which terrified so the Numidian horse, that they beganne presently to dis-band. Faine would Syphax haue stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leaue him. But it fell out vnhappily, that hee was cast from his horse, which receiued a wound, and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forsooke the place, and fled, and that their king, vpon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Masanissa told Lælius, that this victory should make an end of the Numidian warre, if presently they hasted away to Cirta the chiefe citty of the kingdome; whither he himselfe desired to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax, along with him. Hereunto Lælius agreed. Masanissa coming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arriued, called out the chiefe of the Citty to parlee: wherein by many faire promises and threats, but especially by shewing vnto them Syphax bound, he preuayled so farre, that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and euery one stroue to get his fauour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queene Sophonisba yeelded herselfe into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that she might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her suite, that Masanissa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to preuent Lælius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since shee was his wife. But Lælius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainously, so that at first he would haue haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and haue sent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-intreated by Masanissa, he suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax and other captiues immediately; following shortly after himselfe with Masanissa, when they had done what was needfull in the kingdome.

At the comming of Syphax there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field: and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together sought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministring to euery one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not onely to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon them, vnprouoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moued him so to doe; calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, That Masanissa was no wiser than himselfe, since he had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should depriue him of Masanissa, as she had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masanissa and Lælius came vnto him: both of whom together he louingly welcomed; and highly commended in publique, for their notable seruice in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him vnderstand, that the Romans had title to her head, and that she was a mischieuous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he entreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memory of his great seruices already done; (for which he should be highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be gouerned by Scipio, whom he neuertheless entreated, to thinke vpon his faith giuen to Sophonisba, that she should not be deliuered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after some time spent in agony, he called vnto him a seruant of his that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes vsed then to haue in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them vnwilling to liue:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it vnto her with this message; That gladly he would haue had her to liue with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeeld thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserue her from falling aliue into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her selfe.

At the receit of this Message and Present, she onely sayd; That if her husband had no better token to send vnto his new wife, she must accept of this; adding, That she might haue dyed more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her funerall. And herewithall she boldely dranke off the poyson. Thus Liuie reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and sets it downe agreeably to that which hath beene spoken before, concerning the præcontract betweene Masanissa and Sophonisba. He sayth, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadours from Cirta met with Lælius and Masanissa vpon their way thither, yeelding vp their Citty, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne priuate, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had receiued information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Masanissa at his returne; and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masanissa sayd, she was his owne wife, and vnto him betrothed many yeares before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it were true, yet he ſaid it was no reaſon, that Maſaniſſa ſhould keepe her in poſſeſſion, as long as it was diſputable, vnto whom ſhe might appertaine. Wherfore he willed him firſt of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her, wherein he ſhould haue no wrong. Herewithall he ſent to fetch her away: and Maſaniſſa accompanyed the meſſengers, as it were to deliuer her: but making her acquainted with the neceſſity, gaue vnto her a cup of poyſon, wherewith ſhe ended her life, before they came that ſhould haue apprehended her. So he ſhewed vnto the Romans her dead body, which he royally interred. The ſudden violence of Maſaniſſa his loue, and the ready conſent of Sophonisba to marry with him: adde not ſo much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other euident cauſe (which Liuie notes) of the ſudden falling out betweene him and the Carthaginians, vnder whom he had bin trained vp, and done them great ſeruice. Howſoeuer it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragicall accident, ſent for Maſaniſſa, and comforted him as well as he could, leſt his melancholy ſhould leade him to ſome inconuenience. Hauing therefore gently rebuked him for his raſhneſſe, he brought him foorth in preſence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and ſhewing how highly he had deſerued of the Citty of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gaue vnto him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeede the ready way to diuert his thoughts from the ſad remembrance of that which was paſt, vnto the more chearefull contemplation of good fortune, that beganne to ſmile vpon him. Libr. 28.

This was the firſt time that the Romans took vpon them to create or proclaime a king. Which honour though Maſaniſſa well deſerued: yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither ſhould he haue beene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recouered poſſeſſion of his Country, together with the greateſt part of Syphax his dominions. It ſeemeth not vnlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in theſe warres, and ſuſtained himſelfe with his troupe of horſe, in ſuch ſort as he did before the comming of the Romans; he might neuertheleſſe haue recouered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne ſubiects, without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice beene vanquiſhed. As for the enlargement of his kingdome, it was not more than he deſerued: neither were the Romans then in caſe, to make a conqueſt of Numidia for themſelues; neither could they haue wiſhed a fitter opportunity, than of ſuch a man, vpon whom to beſtow it, that was their aſſured friend, and paſſable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Maſeſyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the ſame Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noyſed abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themſelues, in a politicke ſort of grauitie, tooke highly vpon them; as if euen their ſaluting him by the name of King, had beene a matter of great conſequence. He thriued indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, encroaching vpon his neighbours on all ſides; but moſt of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little diſpleaſed. Hence it grew that Vermina the ſonne of Syphax (of whom we ſhall ſhortly ſpeake more) which held ſome peece of his fathers kingdome, deſiring friendſhip of the Romans, and promiſing by all meanes to deſerue their loue, requeſted therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were ſo, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of ſuit: yet the Roman Senate was puntilious herein, and anſwered very grauely, That it was not their cuſtome to giue the honour of that appellation, ſaue onely vnto ſuch Kings, as had greatly deſerued of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; & in proceſſe of time grew ſo proud of this their imaginary prerogatiue, that they imputed as a ſingular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the ſalutation by * that name, though it were not accompanyed with any other fauour or profit thence redounding. Liu. lib. 31. Cæſars Comm. libr. 1.

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians deſire Truce, and breake it.

THe Carthaginians were extreamely diſmayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befalne their good friend Syphax; and vnderſtood that Maſaniſſa their immortall enemy, had got poſſeſſion of his kingdome. To increaſe their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their Citty: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begunne at his laſt being there. The Carthaginians

nians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them; that they sent forth vnto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the citie, which were their Priuy Councell, to make suite for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not onely prostrate themselues on the ground; but kissed the * feet of him, and of those that sate in Councell with him.

Excerpt. è Polib. lib. 15. Liu. lib. 30.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselues to haue vniustly broken the Peace betweene them and Rome; and to haue deserued whatsoeuer punishment it should please the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subiect, they would shew mercy vnto the Citty of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of her Cittizens, had now twice deserued to be ouerthrowne. Herewithal they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appoyntment had begunne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citty. By this it appeares, that these Embassadours were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired worke in hand, of suing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatsoeuer they were, it must needes be that they were most insolent men ouer those that were subiect vnto their power: for they would not haue made such adoration to the Romans, in their owne necessity; vnlesse they themselues had expected the like, where they had the aduantage.

It was not vnknowne to Scipio or to his assistants, in what poore case the citty of Rome then was; and how vnable to defray the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselues had very lately beene. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Cittie farre stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the walles of Carthage; though Vtica, a weaker Cittie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and tolde them, That though hee came into Africke, to make a conquest, and not a Peace: yet hauing the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations vnderstand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Iustice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed vpon them, were these: That they should render vp vnto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitiue slaues: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaule: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland betweene Italie and Africke: That they should deliuer vp all their shippes of warre, saue twentie; and that they should pay a great summe of money, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of wheat and barley. To consider of these Articles, he gaue them three dayes: and when they had approued them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadours vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masanissa was dismissed, and went home into his kingdome, as if the warre had beene already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lælius vnto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with ioy, and gaue hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open, and an holy day appoynted for thankesgiuing and supplication to their gods. Lælius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masanissa: who gratulating the happy successe of the Romans in their African warre, and giuing thankes vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vnto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his subiects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed vpon him, who by rendring them to liberty, should doe an acte very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behind with Masanissa in complement: but shewing themselues to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should do for him, they called him King againe; released his Numidians that were captiues; and sent him two purple Cassocks, that had each of them one gold button, with such other Presents, as in time of their pouerty might serue to testifie their good will. Scarcely were these and Lælius gone from Rome, when the newes came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arriued to desire peace. These Embassadors were were not admitted into the cittie, but were lodged without: vntill Lælius being sent for, came backe from Ostia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience giuen them in the Temple of Bellona; that stood in the Suburbs. The errand of these Embassadours, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their Citty, was onely to winne time, and get respite for warre; vntill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italie, either to chace the Romans out of Africke, or to obtaine peace for Carthage, by terrour of their great names and Armies, vpon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded betweene them and Luctatius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remaine in force: neither had there since beene any warre at all, betweene the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leaue from Carthage, had of his owne head besieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum: and after that aduentured in like sort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so, their Message was none other, than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force; as indeed it hither to did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadours make (as it were) a jeast of a warre, that had beene so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Luctatius, and other passages following betweene the two Cities. But they excused themselues by their age: (for they were all yong men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they sought no other than to gaine time, vntill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Lælius, without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answere. This notwithstanding, wee finde in Polybius, That the Senate receiuing aduertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed betweene him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of peace, approued the Conditions by him propounded, and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceede vnto conclusion. This may with good reason be beleeued, since it was not vnknowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rest vpon the most vncertaine issue of one battell betweene Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should be auerse to them, their forces in Africke were no better than quite lost. Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 15.

Matters thus hanging in suspence, before the Carthaginian Embassadours came backe from Rome, a Fleete out of Sicil, wherein were two hundred shippes of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africke, to victuall the Roman Campe, was ouer-taken by foule weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wrecke, was dispersed, and driuen aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Cittie. There was at that time, as wee finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victualls in Carthage, which caused the people to crie out vpon their Magistrates, that they should not let such a booty escape them; saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger vrged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage vnderstood (as it seemes) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than meere mockery, and therefore cared not for obseruation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the rascality, together with women and boyes, to be medling in vproares; the clamors of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleete was sent out vnder Asdrubal, to gather vp the dispersed Roman shippes of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recouered the station whereto their campe adioyned) and bring them into Carthage; which was done. Scipio was heereat much offended: not onely for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby relieued; but for that by this breach of Truce, he fore-saw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the warre, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadours vnto them, both to require satisfaction for the iniury done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to vnderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace; vpon those conditions which he had propounded. But (said they) we hold it strange, That ye, who so lately haue cast your selues to the ground before vs, & kissed our feet, Appide bello Punico. Excerpt. e Polyb. lib. 15.

after an vn-vſuall manner of humilitie, confeſsing your ſelues to haue perfidiouſly broken the League that was betweene vs, and thereby to haue deſerued ſuch puniſhment as is due vnto Rebels; ſhould ſo ſoone forget what ye then vttered, and runne headlong againe into the ſame crimes, for which yee acknowledged your ſelues worthy to be deſtroyed, hauing onely recourſe vnto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repoſe in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amiſſe, that yee ſhould conſider, how long hee hath bin pent vp in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner beſieged, and vnable to ſtirre: ſo that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greateſt need. Or let it be ſuppoſed, that he were now in Africke, and ready to giue vs battaile: yet ſhould it well agree with your wiſedome, to doubt what might befall; remembring that he is a man, and not inuincible. Now if it ſhould happen that he were ouercome, what refuge haue ye left vnto your ſelues againſt heereafter? What gods will yee either ſweare by, to be beleeued, or call vpon in your miſery? What words, & lamentable geſture will ye henceforth vſe, to moue compaſsion? Surely yee haue already waſted all your force of perſwaſion, and ſhall not againe deceiue vs, if ye refuſe the grace, whereof at this preſent ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themſelues vpbraided with the baſe demeanor of their Embaſſadours. For it was not the generall opinion of the Cittie, that the Truce was broken by themſelues: though it had pleaſed Hanno, or ſuch as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of ſubmiſſion; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all iuſtification of matters paſt. And indeed it ſeemes, that the Roman Embaſſadours were very much delighted, in the rehearſall of that point which was yeelded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the iuſtice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians tooke this in ſo ill part, that hardly they could refraine from doing violence vnto the men, who had vſed vnto them ſuch inſolent ſpeeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in ſome ſort appeaſed; either by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calles Hanno the Great; or by the very reuerence, due vnto the place of thoſe that had vttered ſuch liberall words. So they were diſmiſſed in friendly ſort, although it were without anſwere to their Propoſition. There were alſo two gallies appointed for their ſafe conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their perſons. Aſdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men ſailed from Carthage towards Vtica. He, whether onely deſirous to pleaſe the multitude, of whoſe diſpoſition he was informed, or whether directed by publique order to cut off theſe Embaſſadours in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the riuer Bagradas. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wiſhed them a good voyage; and ſo tooke leaue of them, as if they had beene then in ſafety, ſince the Roman Campe was euen in ſight. The Embaſſadours tooke this in ill part, not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themſelues too much neglected, foraſmuch as their attendants did ſo abruptly leaue them. But no ſooner had they doubled the Cape, than Aſdrubal fell vpon them, in ſuch manner, as they might well diſcerne his purpoſe; which was to haue ſtemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Aſdrubal, they ſlipt away, and made him ouer-ſhoot himſelfe. Yet hee gaue them chace; and had well-neare ſurpriſed them. But they diſcouerd ſome Roman Companies on the ſhoare ouer againſt them, and therefore aduentured to runne their veſſell aground: whereby they ſaued their owne liues, though a great part of their company were ſlaine, or hurt. This practiſe of the Carthaginians was inexcuſable: and for the ſame cauſe perhaps were the Citizens heartned in ſuch a diſhonorable attempt, by thoſe that were deſirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driuen to ſtudie nothing elſe, than how to get the victory, as hauing none other hope remayning. Yet likely it is, that the ſame feare, which had cauſed them to make ſuch earneſt ſuite for peace, would alſo haue cauſed them to be better aduiſed, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not beene giuen to vnderſtand, that Hannibal was already landed in Africke, in whom they repoſed no ſmall confidence; but verily perſwaded themſelues, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themſelues contented with more eaſie conditions, than were thoſe that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

§. XX.

In what ſort Hannibal ſpent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doings of Mago in Italie. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italie. How the Romanes were diuerſly affected by Hannibals departure.

EVer ſince the loſſe of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians; waiting for another ſupply from Carthage. The Roman Conſuls that ſucceeded vnto Claudius and Liuius, by whom Aſdrubal was ouercome and ſlaine, were contented to be quiet all their yeere. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio ought worthie of remembrance againſt Hannibal: being hindred by the peſtilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Conſul who followed Licinius, and Cn. Seruilius Capio, who followed Sempronius, were earneſtly bent to haue done ſomewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitleſſe. In ſome skirmiſhes with Hannibal, they had the better; in ſome, the worſe: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by ſtealth; his care being more to preſerue his Armie, than to keepe thoſe places that were weake.

The Romans had at this time ſo many great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemie was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Africk, wherein they were at no ſmall charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) ſhould bring the warre to a ſhort and happy concluſion. They ſtood neuertheleſſe in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who tooke exceeding paines among the Ligurians and Gaules to raiſe an Armie, wherewith to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that beganne to waxe cold. Mago ſolicited alſo the Hetrurians, and found them ſo readie to ſtirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Countrey ſtrong, it might haue proued no leſſe needfull for Scipio to returne home out of Africk, than ſhortly it was for Hannibal, to make ſpeed vnto the defence of Carthage. Theſe dangers cauſed the Romanes to employ one of their Conſuls or Proconſuls, with an Armie, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gaules; and a third among the Ligurians: for aſmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which ſide Mago would breake out. Being thus buſied, it is no wonder though they forbore to ouercharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in ſome readines for his ſetting forwards, he met in the Countrey of the Inſubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconſul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prætors. With theſe he fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue ſhewed it ſelfe worthie of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull; in ſuch ſort that the Roman Commanders began to diſtruſt the iſſue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horſe, thought to haue ſhaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the ſame time gaue a loud ſhout: and ſtrained themſelues hard; as if at that brunt the victorie ſhould haue beene carried before them. But Mago oppoſed his Elephants to the Horſe: the ſeruice of thoſe beaſts being fitter for ſuch vſe, than againſt the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, ſent, and braying of theſe Elephants, did ſo affright the Horſe, that they ſtarted aſide, and were ſcattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got aduantage vpon them: whoſe manner of fight was more auaileable againſt thoſe that were looſe, than againſt the Troupes that were cloſe and thick. Then fell the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accuſtomed manner, with a ſhowre of darts, and killed foure of them; cauſing all the reſt to giue backe. This notwithſtanding, the ſame Legions were ſo vehemently preſſed by the Enemie; that more for ſhame of running away, than by any great force to make reſiſtance, they held their ground. The Proconſul therefore brought vp thoſe forces, which hee had kept vnto the laſt, to ſuccour where need ſhould moſt require. Againſt theſe Mago employed ſome of his Gaules, whom hee had in readineſſe for the like occaſion. But theſe Gaules diſcharged their parts very ill. They were ſoone beaten off; and recoiled ſo haſtily, that they brought feare vpon all the reſt. When Mago ſaw that his men began to ſhrinke, Hee put himſelfe in the head of his Armie; and held them ſo well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retrait, with their faces toward the Enemie. But at length hee receiued a grieuous wound in his thigh; whereof ſhortly after hee dyed. Hee was taken vp, and carried out of danger by ſome of his owne men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, prouided euery one for himselfe: So the Romans obtained victorie, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about fiue thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Armie, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides diuers Colonels, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hote peece of seruice. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recouered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. How euer it were, this victorie would haue much imported for the assurance of Italie, if the State of Carthage could longer haue permitted these valiant sonnes of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himselfe (by easie iournies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embassadours from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vnderstand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both hee and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italie, since Carthage it selfe was readie to be lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarqued shortly his Armie; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the same time Hannibal receiued the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were readie to burst out, whilest the Embassadors were deliuering their errand. When their message was done; He told them, That this was yet a plaine dealing. For, said He, They that now directly bid mee come home, haue long agoe done their best to hale me out of Italie; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply, that should haue enabled me to manage the Warre heere. Scipio therefore shall not need to bragge, that he hath drawne me home by the heeles: it is Hanno, that hath wrought this noble feat; and ouerwhelmed the House of the Barchines, for lacke of other means to doe it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse, doubting that, which after came to passe: wherein he embarqued, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were, that shrunke backe from him, and refused to doe seruice in this Expedition: of whom such as he could take he slew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, which had been held an inuiolable Sanctuarie vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italie no lesse passionate, then men are wont to be, when they leaue their owne Countries to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that hee had not led his Armie from Canne, hotte and bloudied as it was, directly vnto the Walls of Rome. With such vexation of spirit He quitted the possession of Italie; wherein he had liued almost halfe his time.

If it could haue beene foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this Warre, with what exceeding ioy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italie: they would (I thinke) lesse earnestly haue pressed the Carthaginians to send him ouer thither. When sure aduertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holliday was appointed for thanksgiuing vnto their gods; and extraordinarie great sacrifices publikely made, for ioy of such happy tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his comming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had beene troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his owne Countrie, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. The remoue of the war from their owne dores, and the conceit of that victorie for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would haue done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought vnto them a great masse of Gold and Siluer, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spaine: onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred back vnto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had beene borrowed in time of more necessitie from priuate men. Hence also proceeded the seuere chastisement, laid vpon those 12. Colonies, that for want either of meanes, or of good will, had refused to giue aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had had beene wont to serue for the Warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the vttermost of their abilitie. So confident were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yet suitable to the greatnesse of their spirit) vpon the good successe of the battaile at Metaurus, and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more neerely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italie had beene few daies since discharged, was landed safe in Africk; they began to reuolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would bee found a true Prophet. For bethinking themselues of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax & Asdrubal no specialty of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had beene wont to bring into the field a rascall multitude of halfe-scullions, that were good for nothing; being himselfe a fit Captaine for such Souldiors. Likewise Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was onely good at sauing himselfe by a swift retrait. But now there came an Armie of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fleshed many hundred times in Roman bloud, and weating the spoyles, not onely of good souldiors, but of braue Captaine, by them slaine. Such talke vsed the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battell, with many that had slaine Roman Prætors; yea and Consuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had been first in getting ouer the Trenches of seuerall Romane Campes, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of Townes, briefly, that he should now be opposed by an Armie, as good as euer had serued in warre, and following the dreadfull name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treates with him about peace in vaine: looseth a battaile at Nadagara, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

Hannibal disembarqued his Armie at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercurie, and somwhat more then one degree to the South. He was ill prouided of Horse; which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as hee did, somewhat farre from the Enemie; that hee might furnish himselfe of these and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battell. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the In land Countrie, gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Horses of seruice, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie: making him vnderstand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should be easie for Masanissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppresse both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindered his prospect. This argument, and the fame of him that vsed it, preuailed with Tychæus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further addes, That Mezetullus, (the same who had made himselfe Protectour ouer Mesanissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and aduerse to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermina the son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdom, began at the same time to assaile the places that yeelded obedience to Masanissa. This Vermina, as we finde in Liuie, came with more than 16. thousand men (for he lost more than so many) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would haue made the victorie assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene so base as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for peace; whilest they had such a braue Champion aliue, to maintaine their cause by Warre. But when as they bethought themselues of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, appeared greater than indeed they were: then cried they out earnestly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad: and to this purpose they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answere, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since he was Generall of their forces, Hee thought it reasonable that they should suffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neuertheless, to giue them satisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his Embassadours: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Africk, made Scipio to vnderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions vnprofitable for themselues, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee sent vnto Masanissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out, praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other businesse a-part. Tenne Romane Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masanissa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him seruice in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well vnderstood, that those and many more besides all his owne forces would but little availe him; if Hannibal should driue the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking such order as he could vpon the sudden, for the safetie of his owne Kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and sixe thousand Foot, he made all haste vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors that had been at Rome, returned backe vnder the conduct of Lælius and Fuluius: who brought them safe into the Roman Campe. There when they arriued, and vnderstood what had lately passed, especially how their Citizens had behaued themselues towards the Roman Embassadours: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answere for such torious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion:

M. Bebius one of the late Embassadors that had bin in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands vpon them and detained them; sending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrie, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their owne Coyne, for the iniurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to hear of this; & commanded Bebius to vse them with all possible courtesie, & send them safe home. By thus doing He brake the harts of his Enemies; & caused them to acknowledge themselues (which was a great victorie) far lesse honourable then the Romans. This notwithstanding, He made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to sacke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Towne by assault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatsoeuer they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselues terrible: and the better to worke such impression in the mindes of those, with whom they had to do, they vsed oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beasts, that ranne athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies asunder, as men delighted in shedding of bloud. This being their practise at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no peece of crueltie, when they meant to giue proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengeful mindes, for the iniuries receiued. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 10.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, sent forth his Scowts and Spies, to discouer where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, & brought vnto Scipio: who in stead of trussing them vp, gaue them free leaue to view his Campe at pleasure; appointing one to conduct them vp and downe, and shew them whatsoeuer they desired. This done, He gaue them leaue to depart; and sent them away safe vnto their Generall. Hannibal vnderstanding this, admired the brauery and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to haue an Enter-view, and personall conference, and signified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answer, that Hee would meet him shortly in a place conuenient. The next day Masanissa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him, remooued vnto a Towne called Nadagara; neere vnto which he sat downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by

by a water that might opportunely ſerue his Campe. Thence hee ſent word vnto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly ſerue, if He had ought to ſay to him. Hannibal thereupon remoued from Zama, & came within foure miles of the Enemie: where he encamped well to his own good liking in all things elſe; excepting that his men were driuen to take much paines, in fetching their water ſomewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generalls, each of them with a troup of Horſe, rode foorth of their Campes, till they came vnto a peece of ground; which was before well ſearched, for feare of ambuſh. There they will their followers to ſtand off: and themſelues with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way betweene their Companies. They remained a while ſilent, viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, ſaluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had beene better both for Carthage and Rome, if they could haue limited and contained their ambition within the ſhores of Africk & of Italie; for that the Countries of Sicil and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themſelues had ſtriuen, were no ſufficient recompence for ſo many Fleets as had beene loſt, and of ſo much bloud as had beene ſhedde, in making thoſe coſtly purchaſes. But ſince things paſt could not be recalled: He ſaid, That it was meet for them to conſider, vnto what extreame dangers their owne Cities had beene expoſed, by the greedy deſire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was euen time for them now at length, to make an end of their obſtinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wiſedome hereafter. And to ſuch peaceable diſpoſition Hee affirmed that his owne yeares, and long triall of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared; that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his minde vpon vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutabilitie, whereto all humane affaires are ſubiect. Yet (ſaid hee) mine owne example may peraduenture ſuffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that ſame Hannibal, who after my victorie at Cannæ, wonne the greateſt part of Italie: and deuiſed with my ſelfe, what I ſhould doe with your Citie of Rome; which I hoped verily to haue taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles, as thou haſt ſince brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, ſee the change! I ſtand heere entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may ſerue as a document of Fortunes inſtabilitie. I haue fought with thy father, Scipio: Hee was the firſt of the Romane Generalls, that euer met mee in the field. I did then little thinke, that the time would come, that I ſhould haue ſuch buſineſs, as not at the preſent, with his ſonne. But this is euen one of Fortunes Pageants, whereof ſhee hath many. And thou maiſt haue experience of the like in thy ſelfe, who knowes how ſoone? Thinke vpon M. Atilius. If he would haue hearkened vnto ſuch perſwaſions, as I now vſe to thee; he might haue returned home to Rome an happy man. And ſo maiſt thou doe now, if any reaſonable offer will giue thee ſatisfaction. How ſaiſt thou? Canſt thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicil, Sardinia, and whatſoeuer Ilands elſe are ſituate betweene Italie and Africke, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for euer; and left vnto the Romans; to beare Dominion therein? Thou ſhalt haue glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of ſuch a bargaine. As for vs: our owne quiet ſhall henceforth giue vs contentment. And the ſame contentment of ours, ſhall make vs faithfully obſerue the Peace with you. But if thou thinkeſt all too little, I muſt deſire thee to ponder well how great an hazzard thou muſt vndergoe for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou maiſt haue without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay hold vpon good Fortune, if it pleaſe thee: ſtay but vntill to morrow night; and thou maiſt take ſuch fortune, as it pleaſe the gods. The iſſue of battaile is vncertaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steele wee ſhall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victorie, neither of vs hath aſſurance. Let vs therefore without more adoe, make peace. And doe not tell me, that ſome falſe-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treatie: It is I Hannibal that now deſire peace with thee; which I would neuer doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrie. And thinking it expedient, I will alwaies maintaine it: like as I haue maintained vnto my power, as long as the gods did not enuie me, the Warre by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made anſwere, That it was no ambitious deſire of ruling in Sicil and in Spaine, which had moued the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had cauſed them to put on thoſe armes; which the gods by the finall iſſue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to bee moſt iuſt. As for the mutabilitie of Fortune, he said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence, or ouer-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plaine, that all these Countries, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already wonne from the Romans? If, said He, these Conditions had beene propounded whilest as yet we detained some part of Italie, they might peraduenture not haue beene reiected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit vnto you any one piece of these my former demands; to which the Carthaginians haue yeelded alreadie, and thought me to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the iniuries which they haue done me since, haue made them vnworthy of obtaining peace vpon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldst be glad to make thy Citizens vnderstand, from how much of their burden they are by thy meanes eased. Onely thou must thinke, that in like sort it concernes me in honour, not to let them be gainers or sauers by the wrongs which they haue done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore vnto vs ransome-free, all prisoners that they haue of ours; to pay vs fiue thousand Talents; to deliuer vp their Gallies; and to deliuer hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce; their spoyling of our Fleet; and their violating our Embassadours? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these iniuries newly done: then will I take aduice with my Councell what answere to giue you; otherwise, you may euen prepare for warre, and blame your owne selues, for that I haue denied you peace.

Heereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell betweene Rome and Carthage. The next morning at breake of day they issued into the field: a notable march, and such as hath very seldome beene found; whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, diuided into their Maniples; or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behinde these followed the Principes, likewise diuided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinarie custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite vnto the void spaces betweene the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was vsuall, might fall backe betweene the Principes; but he placed them directly one behinde another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse, whilest there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke such order, that when they had passed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, hee gaue direction, that when they found themselues to be ouer-charged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betweene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behind all their owne Armie; thereby leauing roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behinde, to saue themselues on the voyde ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battailes, without cloying vp the way betweene the Maniples, which hee desired to keepe open. His Italian horse hee placed in the left wing vnder C. Lælius. In the right wing was Masanissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; vsing words, not many, but forcible. He bade them remember what they had atchieued, since their comming into Africke. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end: and that their victory in this warre, should make them Lords of all the world; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would flie. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neither was there any place in Africke, that would giue them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: vnlesse they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most mercilesse Enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselues to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, haue neuer beene knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than foure score, in Front

Front of his Battaile. Next behind these, he made his Vantguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gaules, Baleares and Moores. Then followed his Battaile: which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interessed in the quarrell than were those Mercenaries; though not so good souldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More then the space of a furlong behinde these came his Rereward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had serued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lælius, in his owne right wing hee bestowed the Carthaginian Horse. Tychæus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masanissa. He was indeed farre too weake for the Enemie in Horse, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tychæus and Mezetullus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the 4. thousand of Masanissa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be leuied in the haste of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that had of late beene often vanquished, and accustomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritie, to make these his companiõs alight and serue on foote, setting better men in their saddles. All that hee could haue done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermina the sonne of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixteene thousand and vpwards, the most of them Horse; the aduantage of number might haue serued well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must bee faine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that he reposed in his old Italian souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encoraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their seuerall conditions: promising vnto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards: threatning the Carthaginians with ineuitable seruitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had slaughtered at Canna. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very worst of the Romane Souldiers; euen such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundry battailes, could no longer bee trusted to beare Armes in their owne Countrie. As for the rest: they were yong men, the sonnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continuall feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chased. Wherefore hee entreated these his olde companions, vpon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day striue to make good their honour; and to purchase the fame of men inuincible.

Such exhortations vsed the two Generalls before the fight. When they drew nere together, the Numidian Horsemen on both sides began to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, sounded to battaile: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake vpon the Romanes. Of these Elephants (as they were alwaies an vncertaine kind of helpe) those that stood nere vnto the point of the left wing, turned backe for feare: and ranne vpon their owne Numidian Horse; which they affrighted and disordered. Masanissa espying this, gaue charge vpon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to re-ally themselues, draue them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Romane Velites, whom they followed into the spaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselues; which gaue them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well prouided. Diuers of them receiuing many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be gouerned: but ranne backe vpon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horse which were in that wing: against whom they gaue to Lælius the same aduantage, that Masanissa had against the Numidians; which he vsed in like sort. In the meane while, the battailes of foote aduanced, and drew nere together with a slow and wately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what time they gaue a shout, and ranne one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quickenesse, to haue the better of the Romanes; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Romane discipline after a while, preuailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a litile, that the battell

of the Principes, following somewhat neere after the Hastati, encouraged their fellowes; and shewed themselues ready, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries receiued no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should haue seconded them. For the new-leuiee Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hired souldiers giue backe, did also themselues retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gaules, and the rest, to thinke themselues betrayed: whereupon they enclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaile was herewith more terrified then before, so as it refused to giue way vnto the Mercenaries for their safe retrait; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellowes, to turne their Armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercenaries. The Romane Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of worke, that the Principes were faine to come vp vnto them, and helpe to ouer-beare this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themselues. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another, could neither fight, nor easily flie. Such of them as escaped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or saue these Run-awaies. Hee caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne side, that would haue rushed vpon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battaile, and saue themselues in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romanes were now to march, ere they could meete with Hannibal, was couered with heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slipperie with bloud: that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should bee dissolued in passing that way. In such case, if hee should fight with that warrelike Armie, which hee saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without feare expecting him; He might be well assured to receiue a notable ouerthrow. Hee caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the maine battaile of the Hannibalians. Then drawing vp his Principes and Triarij: He placed them, when they had ouercome the bad way, all in in one Front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he aduanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer hee had beene receiued in his life before. All the daies worke till now, seemed to haue beene a matter of pastime; in regard of the sharpe Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their hauing preuailed all the day before: They were also farre the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; but rather chose to die on the ground, whereon hee stood. So that, after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worse: vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of Masanissa and Lalius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to haue beene most happie and in a needfull time. These vpon a sudden charged the Hannibalins in Rere; and ouer-bearing them by meere violence, compelled them too fall Rout.

In this Battaile there died of the Romanes fifteene hundred and vpwards: on the Carthaginian side, aboue twenty thousand, besides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captaine of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polibius; and was acknowledged, as Liuie reports, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse: and being enioyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage to take battaile with such disaduantage, hee could worke no maruels. Hee saued himselfe with a few Horse; and stayed not in his iourney, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage; from which he had bene absent sixe and thirtie yeeres. At his comming into the Senate He said plainly That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other course to take, resolued to send Embassadours againe; and try the fauour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio hauing spoiled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arriued, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. With this this Fleet, and that which he had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the Citie; than with any hope to take it. His Legions hee committed vnto Cn. Octauius; whom hee willed to meete him there by land. Then sending Lælius away to Rome with newes of the victory, He set saile from Vtica towards Carthage. He was encountred on the way by tenne Embassadours from the Citie: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, began to vse the pittifull gesture of suppliants. But they receiued none other answere, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where He would giue them audience. So rowing along before the Citie: and viewing it more in brauerie, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned backe to Vtica, and called backe Octauius thither, with whom in person Hee set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journie thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, was comming with an Armie of more Horse then Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermina seemes to haue beene both carelesse of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defectiue in all other dueties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not onely beate him, but so compasse him in, that he hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leauing fifteene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelue hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had bene with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should haue beene farre better conducted, and might well haue changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian lost, by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great accesse vnto the former, yet serued wel to daunt the Carthaginians, & imprint in thē the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadours from Carthage: whose behauiour though it was more pitiful than it had bin before, yet procured it lesse commiseratiō, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselues. Neuertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious worke it would proue, to besiege the mighrie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this warre, if it were protracted, should bee taken out of his handes; and giuen to one of the Consuls. Cn. Seruilius Capio, that Consul who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as hee departed out of Italie: was bold to passe ouer into the Ile of Sicil (as it were in chase of Hannibal by him terrified and driuen away) with a purpose thence to haue proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the Command of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restraine the ambition of this Consul Seruilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suite for the same Prouince of Africk: and was therein so earnest, that though neyther the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet he needes would be going, procuring onely leaue of the Senate, that he being Consul might ioyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authoritie. But ere He could haue his Fleete and all things in a readines for the iourney, wherein no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and hee was onely tost at Sea with foule weather, first vpon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship expired, and so hee returned home a priuate man. Then came the ioyfull newes to Rome, of the victory obteined against Hannibal, and that the warre was now euen at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so passionate, in desiring Africk for his Prouince, That he said he would suffer nothing to passe in the Senate, vntill hee had first his will. Much adoe there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should bee granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should haue command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to giue the more fauourable answere vnto the Carthaginian Embassadours. Hee willed them to consider what they had deserued: and in regard thereof to thinke themselues well dealt withall, in that he was contented to leaue vnto them their libertie and their owne Lawes, without appointing any Gouernour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subiection; leauing also vnto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this war. As touching the rest he was at a point, That, before he either granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilest the late Treatie was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld; then required Hee That immediatly they should deliuer vp vnto the Romans all Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, that they had of theirs: likewise all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants: That they should make

no warre at all thence foorth out of Africke, neither yet within Africke, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Townes, goods whatsoeuer, belonging any wise vnto Masaniſſa, or to any of his Anceſtors, which were in their poſſeſſion, ſhould be all by them reſtored vnto him: That they ſhould finde corne for the Roman Army, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, vntill the Peace were fully concluded: That they ſhould pay tenne thouſand Talents of Siluer, in the terme of fifty yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for obſeruance of Conditions, they ſhould giue an hundred hoſtages, ſuch as Scipio would chooſe, being none of them vnder fouretcene yeares of age, nor aboue thirty.

With theſe conditions the Embaſſadours returned home, and reported them vnto the Cittie. They were very vnpleaſing; and therefore one Giſco ſtood vp to ſpeake againſt them: and exhorted the people, who gaue good attention, that they ſhould not condeſcend vnto ſuch intollerable demands. But Hannibal perceiuing this, and noting withall what fauourable audience was giuen to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarrelike Multitude, was bold to pull him downe from his ſtanding, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, byſuch inſolence of this preſumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiuing, roſe vp and ſpake vnto them, ſaying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwiſe than the cuſtomes of the Citty would allow; foraſmuch as he had beene thence abſent euer ſince he was a Boy of nine yeares olde, vntill he was now a man of fiue and fortie. Hauing thus excuſed himſelfe of the diſorder, hee diſcourſed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perſwaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themſelues; had the demands of the Enemy beene yet more rigorous. Finally, vpon good aduice, they reſolued to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paied out of hand fiue and twenty thouſand pounds weight of ſiluer, in recompence of damages, and iniuries by them done to his Fleet and Embaſſadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gaue iniunction, that they ſhould neither in the meane while ſend Embaſſadours any whither elſe, nor yet diſmiſſe any Embaſſadours to them ſent, without firſt making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wiſe and honourable men, by the miſeries whereinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious counſailes. Aſdrubal, ſurnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embaſſages which they ſent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embaſſadours, who related vnto the Senate and People theſe ioyfull newes. About the ſame time arriued at Rome Embaſſadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to waite a while for audience, till the election of new Conſuls then in hand was finiſhed; and order taken, for the Prouinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embaſſadors called into the Senate: who firſt anſwering vnto ſome points, wherein the Romans had lately ſignified vnto their King, that they found themſelues grieued; returned the blame vpon thoſe Greekes themſelues, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accuſed they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embaſſadours, that had lately been ſent from Rome vnto King Philip, tarried in Greece behinde his fellowes; and there leuying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betweene him and the Romans. Further they deſired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countrimen, that had lately ſerued Hannibal for Pay; and being taken priſoners in Africke, were kept in bonds by Scipio, might be releaſed and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had ſent to Rome for that purpoſe, made a ſharp anſwer. He ſaid, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured ſo many iniuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to ſtay behinde, to helpe them as he might; which elſe were like to be brought vnder the Kings ſubiection. As for Sopater: hee affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counſaile, and very inward with him; one that ſerued not for money, but carried money with him, and foure thouſand men, ſent from the King to the ayde of Hannibal. About theſe points when the Macedonian Embaſſadors could make vnto the Senate no good anſwer: they were willed to returne, and tell their Maſter, That warre he ſought, and warre he ſhould finde, if he proceeded as he had begunne. For in two maine points Hee had broken the League, that was betweene him and the Romanes: firſt, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and ſecondly, in that he had ayded their Enemies againſt them with men and money.

Theſe quarrels with Philip, that promiſed to open a way into Greece and the Eaſterne Countreies, helped well the Carthaginian Embaſſadours in their ſollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reuerend company, when they entred into the Senate: and Aſdrubal aboue the reſt was much reſpected, as one, whoſe good offices had kept the Romanes from neceſſitie of ſending Embaſſadours to Carthage, vpon the like errand. Hee liberally granted, that the iuſtice of the quarrell had beene wholly on the Romanes ſide; ſaying that it was the fault of ſome violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuſe the Citie; that had beene too vehement in the proſecution of bad counſaile. But if Hanno and himſelfe might haue had their wills: the Carthaginians, euen at the beſt of their Fortune, ſhould haue granted the peace which they now deſired. Herewithall hee commended the moderation of the Romanes, as no ſmall argument of their valour; by which alwayes they had beene victorious. To the ſame effect ſpake the reſt of the Embaſſadours: all of them entreating to haue the Peace ratified; though ſome with more lamentable words than others, according to the diuerſitie of their ſtile. They had patience enough to endure ſuch reproofe of Periurie, as they themſelues might haue laid vpon the Romanes; if their diligence and fortune had beene ſuch as the Romanes was. Among the reſt, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would ſweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Aſdrubal made anſwere; Euen by the ſame gods, that are ſo ſeuere vnto thoſe that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Conſul interpoſing the authoritie of his Office, would haue hindred the Senate from proceeding vnto concluſion of peace; for that hereby Hee was like to loſe the honour, which hee purpoſed to get by making warre in Africk. But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom reſted the Soueraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto the pleaſure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with tenne Delegates ſent vnto him from Rome of purpoſe, ſhould make a League with the Carthaginians, vpon ſuch Conditions as ſeemed beſt: which were none other, than the ſame which he had alreadie propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embaſſadoures humbly thanked the Senate; and craued licence, that they might viſite their Countrimen, which were priſoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ranſome and carrie home with them ſome, that were their eſpeciall friends; of whom they gaue in writing almoſt two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of thoſe Priſoners, which the Embaſſadours would chooſe, ſhould be ſent ouer into Africk, and bee freely reſtored to liberti: by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leaue, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to ioyne with Scipio in Commiſſion.

At their comming into Africk, the Peace was giuen, and accepted, without any controuerſie or diſputation: The Priſoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, were deliuered vp to Scipio: likewiſe the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegados, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon thoſe of the Romans than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romanes he crucified. About the firſt payment of their money, the Carthaginians were ſomewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treaſurie could haue ſpared two hundred Talents for the preſent: yet ſince the penſion was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeeres; it was thought meete to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collection of the ſumme there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Romane yoke had begunne to pinch them; ſo as many, euen of the Senatours, could not forbeare weeping. Contrariwiſe Hannibal could not refraine from laughter. For which when he was checked by Aſdrubal Hadus, and tolde, That it worſt of all beſeemed him to laugh, ſince he had bene the cauſe why all other did weepe; He anſwered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from ioy; but ſometime from extremitie of indignation. Yet, ſaid He, My laughter is more reaſonable, and leſſe abſurd, than your teares. For ye ſhould haue wept, when ye gaue vp your Shippes and Elephants, and when ye bound your owne hands from the vſe of Armes; without the good leaue of the Romanes firſt obteined. This miſerable condition keepes vs vnder, and holds vs in aſſured ſeruitude. But of theſe matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your priuate purſes, ye haue thereof some sense. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye shall acknowledge, That it was the very least part of your miserie, for which ye haue shed these teares. Thus discourſed Hannibal vnto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their owne malicious counsaile, repented when it was too late; and in stead of cursing their owne disorders, which had bred this grieuous disease, accused that Physicion, whose noble endeauors had beene employed in procuring the remedie.

Scipio beeing to take leaue of Africk, produced Masanissa, and magnified him in presence of the Armie, with high commendations not vndeseruedly. To him also hee consigned ouer those Towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held: wherein, to say truth, he gaue him but his due; and that which otherwise he knew not wel how to bestow. But the loue of the Romans, & friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deseruings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarqued themselues for Sicil: where when they arriued at Lilybæum, Scipio with some part of his Armie tooke his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His iourney through Italie was no lesse glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. Hee entred the Citie in Triumph: neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great ioy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in bravery of the pompe, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie in this Triumph; and died soone after in prison: or whether hee were dead a while before; it cannot bee affirmed. Thus much may be auowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Romans, to insult ouer the calamities of mightie Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made faire and courteous warre. But hereof we shall haue better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grieuous warre past, whereof the Romans had beene in a manner without hope that euer they should set Italy free. This made them looke cheerefully vpon the Author of so great a conuersion; and filled them with more ioy, than they well could moderate. Wherfore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: stiling him by the name of that Prouince which hee had subdued. This honorable kinde of surname, taken from a conquered Prouince, grew afterwards more common, and was vsurped by men of lesse desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselues the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could haue made them like in vertue vnto Scipio the African.

Plut. in vita Sertorij.

F the great similitude found in worldly euents, the limitation of matter hath beene assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined vnto a subiect that is not vnbounded; the workes of Nature must needes bee finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependance vpon the will of man, wee are lesse to wonder if wee finde lesse varietie: since it is no great portion of things which is

obnoxious vnto humane power; and ſince they are the ſame affections, by which the wills of ſundrie men are ouer-ruled, in mannaging the affaires of our daily life. It may be obſerued in the change of Empires, before thoſe times whereof we now write, how the Aſſyrians or Chaldæans inuaded the Kingdome of Medes, with two hundred thouſand Foot, and threeſcore thouſand Horſe: but failing in their intended conqueſt, they became ſubiect within a while themſelues vnto the Medes and Perſians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with ſuch number of men, as might haue ſeemed reſiſtleſſe. But after that the Perſians were beaten home againe, their Empire was neuer ſecure of the Greekes: who at all times of leiſure from inteſtine Warre, deuiſed vpon that conqueſt thereof, which finally they made vnder the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonoſor with his rough old ſouldiers, had vndertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well-trayned Armie, had made the attempt vpon Greece; the iſſue might, in humane reaſon, haue beene farre different. Yet would it then haue beene expedient for them, to employ the trauell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatneſſe of their names, againſt thoſe people; that were no leſſe valiant, though leſſe renowned, than their owne. For the menacing words vſed by Cyrus, and ſome ſmall diſpleaſures done to the Greekes (in which kinde it may bee, that Nabuchodonoſor likewiſe offended the Medes and Perſians) were not ſo auaileable to victorie, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in ſtrength, ſuffer as did the olde Lyon, for the oppreſſion done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Aſſe. But Princes are often carried away from reaſon, by miſſe-vnderſtanding the language of Fame: and deſpiſing the vertue that makes little noyſe, aduenture to prouoke it againſt themſelues; as if it were not poſſible that their owne glorie ſhould be foyled by any of leſſe-noted excellence. Againſt the ſame ſtone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Euilmerodach, had ſtumbled; Pyrrhus the Epirot hath daſht his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though moſt of marke, and a better ſouldior then any other Greekiſh King, when he entred into warre againſt the Romans. This war he vndertooke as it were for his minds ſake: hauing receiued no iniurie; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that ſerued vnder him; to preuaile ſo eaſily againſt the barbarous Romanes, that they ſhould onely ſerue as a ſtep to his further intended conqueſts, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory againſt Pyrrhus, had found their owne vertue to be of richer mettall, than was the more ſhining valour of the Greekes: then did all the braucry of the Epirot (his Elephants and whatſoeuer elſe had ſerued to make him terrible) ſerue only to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themſelues. For ſince they had ouercome the beſt Warriour in Greece, euen Him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himſelfe Lord of Greece and Macedon: what ſhould hinder them from the conqueſt of all thoſe vnwarlike Prouinces, which in compaſſe of 12. yeeres a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requiſite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotion by ſome good meanes, the whole Country of Greece: all the reſt, this done, would follow of it ſelfe. How to deale with the Greekes; Philip and Alexander had ſhewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

* The King of Spaines pretended inuincible Nauie, being beaten out of the Britiſh ſeas, inuited vs to thoſe of Spaine: and hauing broke the greateſt Fleet that euer the Spaniards gathered together; we neuer made account of any of his preparations after that time

When therefore the firſt Punicke warre was ended, which followed ſoone after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leiſure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occaſion, that ſhould bee on that ſide preſented. They had alſo then a ſtrong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwiſe very skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wiſhed, that the Illyrian Queene Teuta made at the ſame time cruel Warre vpon the Greeks: waſting their Country, and ſacking their Townes, onely becauſe they were vnable to reſiſt, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romanes were deſirous to enter; the Queene was not ſlow to giue them cauſe. And their happy accompliſhing of that war which they made with Her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to bee deſired by the Greekes. But no ſuch thing happened: though they ſent Embaſſadours, as it were to offer themſelues; by ſignifying, that for loue of Greece they had vndertaken this Illyrian warre. Thus beganne the firſt acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romans: which afterwards encreaſed very haſtilie, through the indiſcretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whoſe buſineſſe with them, being now the ſubiect of our ſtorie, it is meet that wee ſhould relate (though ſomewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his firſt Actions. It was like to proue a buſie time in the world, when, within the ſpace of 4. yeeres, new Kings began to reigne in the moſt of all Countries knowne; and 3. of them young boyes, in 3. of the greateſt Kingdoms. This hapned from the third yere of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Aſia and Syria, in whoſe roome ſucceeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolomie Philopator ſucceeded in the Kingdome of Ægypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the ſonne of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. yeeres old, receiued the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achæans and moſt of the Greeks, by the deceaſe of his Vncle Antigonus Doſon, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the ſame time alſo was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedæmon, & the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then beganne his reigne in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found meanes to make himſelfe King ouer the Lacedæmonians, whoſe Common-weale, ſince the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headleſſe; and Achæus, a kinſman of Antiochus, but a Rebell vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Laſtly, in the ſecond & third yeares of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Inuaſion vpon Italie. Thoſe troubles of the Weſterne world, which were indeed the greateſt, we haue already followed vnto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, and the reſt, we ſhall ſpeake hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, ſoone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponneſus; greatly deſired of the Achæans, and many others his dependants. That Country, hauing freed it ſelfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an eaſie ſubiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no leſſe obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it ſhould haue beene to the Spartan; and therewithal it lay open vnto the violence of the Ætolians, who deſpiſed euen the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Ætolians were no men to be idle, nor were much addicted to any other Art than warre. Therfore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Meſſenians that were their owne Clients, & (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their conſanguinitie) the onely good friends which they had at the preſent in Peloponneſus. Their inuaſion was no leſſe vnexpected, then it was vniuſt: wherby with greater eaſe they made ſpoyle of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make reſiſtance. The Achæans, were called by the Meſſenians to help: which they did the more willingly; becauſe the Ætolians paſſing without leaue through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they liſted. Olde Aratus could hardly abide theſe Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the iniuries, wherewith moſt ingratefully they had requited no ſmall benefits done to them by the Achæans. Hee was therefore ſo haſty to fall vpon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to ſtay a few daies vntill the time of his owne Office came;
Lib. 3. chap. 2. §. 6. beeing choſen Prætor of the Achæans for the yeere following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he ſhewed himſelfe a man fitter (as hath been already noted of him) for any other ſeruice, than leading of an Armie. He ſuffered them to paſſe quietlie along with their bootie, through a part of the Countrie, wherein he might very eaſilie haue diſtreſſed them; and afterwards preſſed them ſo neere, when they had recouered ground of aduantage, that they eaſily defeated all his Armie. So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne agayne. As for the Achæans, they got hereby onely the friendſhip of the Meſſenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Ætolians inuaded Peloponneſus againe; hauing no more to doe, than to paſſe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. There ioyned with them, in this their ſecond inuaſion, a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that Condition impoſed vpon them by the Romans, of ſetting out no ſhips of war vnto the coaſt of Greece: made bold to ſeek aduentures againe, and did great Chap. 3. §. 1. miſchiefe. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of theſe Illyrians: who ſhortly repented him of this his voyage; which cauſed him to loſe his Kingdome, as is ſhewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, & fell vpon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Ægean ſea: whence returning, he did ſome good offices for king Philip, or his friends. The reſt of the Illyrians vnder Scerdilaidas, or Scerdiletus, hauing gotten what they could elſe-where by rouing at Sea, accompanied the Ætolians into Peloponneſus: who made greater hauocke in the Countrey now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home, without finding any reſiſtance.

Of theſe things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when hee came to Corinth. And becauſe men were deſirous to ſatisfie themſelues with ſome ſpeedy reuenge: there were that vrged to haue ſome grieuous puniſhment layd vpon the Lacedæmonians: who were thought vnder-hand to haue fauoured the Ætolians, in meere deſpight of the Achæans and Macedonians, by whom themſelues had lately beene ſubdued. It is true, that the Lacedæmonians had beene ſo affected: and (which was worſe) at the arriuall of Philip, they ſlew ſuch friends of his, as hauing checked their inclination, ſeemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durſt they well commit themſelues to iudgement: but entreated the King, that he would abſtaine from comming to them with an Army: ſince their Towne was lately much diſquieted with ciuil diſcord, which they hoped ſoone to appeaſe, and meant alwayes to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was eaſily ſatisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did miſ-vnderſtand the Lacedæmonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in preſence of the King, the Embaſſadours of the Achæans, Bœotians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complayning vpon the Ætolians: and deſiring to haue warre decreed againſt them, by common aſſent. Philip ſent his letters vnto the Ætolians, requiring them to make ready their anſwer in ſome conuenient time: if they could alleadge any thing in excuſe of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet ſhould be holden at Rhium for that purpoſe: whither if it pleaſed him to come, or ſend, he ſhould be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue beene there at the day. But when the Ætolians vnderſtood this for certaintie, they adiourned the Councell vnto a further time: ſaying, That ſuch weighty matters ought not to be handled, ſaue in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This tricke of Law notwithſtanding, open war was proclaimed againſt them. And they, as it were to ſhew how wel they had deſerued it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of theſe Inuaſions made on Peloponneſus; and the onely man, in a ſort, vpon whom they muſt haue laid the blame of theſe actions, if they would haue ſhifted it from the publike.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where hee prepared buſily for the warre againſt the yeare following. He alſo aſſayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with faire words and promiſes; whom he eaſily won from the Ætolian ſide, foraſmuch as the Ætolians had couſened him of his ſhare, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like ſort the Achæans, who had firſt of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Countrey, ſent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Meſſenians, & Lacedæmonians: requeſting them forthwith to declare themſelues, and to denounce warre vnto the Ætolians; without ſtaying (as it were) to await the euent. Hereunto they receiued diuerſe anſweres, according to the qualities of thoſe with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a ſmall Nation, and bordering vpon the Ætolians, of whom they ſtood in continuall danger, ſayd, that they could not honeſtly refuſe to ſhew their faithfull meaning in that warre, which was concluded by generall aſſent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were neuertheleſſe more cunning and reſerued: ſo that they ſtood vpon a needleſſe point, and deſired to be held excuſed, vntill Philip (of whoſe meaning they needed not to haue made any doubt) ſhould firſt proclaime the war. The Meſſenians, for whoſe cauſe the warre was vndertaken, excuſed themſelues, by reaſon of a Towne which the Ætolians held vpon their borders; and ſayd, that they durſt not be ouer-bold, vntill that bridle were taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedæmonians, the chiefe of them ſtudied onely, how to mannage the treaſon, for which their City had beene ſo lately pardoned: and therefore diſmiſſed the Embaſſadours of the Confederates, without any anſwere at all. They had three yeares together continued ſubiect againſt their wills to the Macedonians, expecting ſtill when Cleomenes ſhould returne out of Ægypt to reigne ouer them agayne, and maintayne, as hee was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they choſe not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of theſe there were ſome, that thought the publike ſafety to conſiſt, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preſerued them: And hereto they referred all their counſailes: being perhappes a little moued with reſpect of the benefit, which might redound vnto themselues, by adhering firmely to those which at the present bore rule ouer them. Others, and those the greater part, were still deuising, how to make all ready for Cleomenes against his returne; and sought to ioyne with the Ætolians, which were the most likely to giue him strong assistance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority and durst more freely speake their mindes: but the contrary side was the more passionate, and spared not by murders, or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neyther did it suffice, that about these times there came certayne report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended: fancying vnto themselues the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as were not like to come agayne. Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them vnto their greatnesse and lustre; which once hee had in a manner performed: But since hee was dead, and that, without iniury to his well-deseruing vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would haue, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helpes, they must continue little better than subiects vnto the Macedonian, and farre lesse by him respected, than were the Achæans. Thus were they transported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among them, procured the Ætolians to send an Embassie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly vnto the people, whereof no one of the Cittizens durst haue made himselfe the Author. Much disputation, and hot, there was, betweene those of the Macedonian partie, and these their opposites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded; vntill by massacre or banishment of all, or the chiefe, that spake against the Ætolians, the diuersitie of opinion was taken quite away. Then foorthwith a League was concluded betweene the Lacedæmonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achæans, who had spared the Cittie, when they might haue destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardfull of their auncient Lawes, as touching the choosing of the one King, that wee may iustly wonder, how they grew so carelesse in making choice of the other. In the one of their royall Families they found Agesipolis, the son of Agesipolis the son of king Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reigne ouer them, as heire apparant to his grandfather. This Agesipolis was a yong Boy, standing in neede of a Guardian; and had an Vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Gouernement. Yet because the Law required, that the sonne, how young soeuer, should haue his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedæmonians, though standing in neede of a man, were so punctuall in obseruation of the Law, that they made this childe their King, and appoynted his Vncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the royall Family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themselues about any of them, to examine the goodnesse of his Claime, but made election of one Lycurgus, who hauing no manner of title to the kingdome, bestowed vpon each of the Ephori, a Talent, and thereby made himselfe be saluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus, to gratifie his Partisans, and to appoue his worth by action, inuaded the Countrey of the Argiues: which lay open and vngarded, as in a time of peace. There he did great spoile, and won diuers Townes; whereof two he retained, and annexed vnto the State of the Lacedæmon. After such open hostility, the Lacedæmonians declared themselues on the Ætolian side, and proclaimed warre against the Achæans.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwise, than the Achæans and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready in the Epirots, gaue vncertayne answere: the Messenians would not stirre: all the burden must lie vpon themselues and the poore Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by fauour of the Eleans, could inuade at pleasure, as they were like to doe; and by helpe of the Lacedæmonians, could assaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, passing ouer the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Towne of Ægira: which if they could haue held, they should thereby grieuously haue molested the Achæans, for that it stood in the mid-way betweene Ægium and Sicyon, two of their principall Cities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrey. But as Ægira was taken by surprise, so was it presently lost agayne, through greedinesse of spoyle; whilest they that should haue made it their first care, to assure the place vnto themselues, by occupying the citadel and other peeces of strength, fell headlong to ransacke priuate houses, and thereby gaue

the Citizens leaue to make head, by whom they were driuen with great ſlaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About the ſame time, another Ætolian Armie landing among the Eleans, fell vpon the Weſterne Coaſt of Achaia; waſting all the Territorie of the Dymæans and other people, that were firſt beginners of the Achæan Confederacie. The Dymæans and their neighbours made head againſt theſe Inuaders; but were ſo well beaten, that the enemie grew bolder with them than before. They ſent for helpe vnto their Prætor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Achæans hauing lately beene much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to doe little of themſelues: neither could they get any ſtrength of Mercenaries; foraſmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his warre, they had couetouſly with-held part of their due from thoſe that ſerued them therein. So through this diſability of the Achæans, and inſufficiency of their Prætor; the Dymæans, with others, were driuen to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publike ſeruice, and to conuert the money to their owne defence. Lycurgus alſo with his Lacedæmonians, began to winne vpon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip and the Achæans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilſt their Armie was thus employed a farre off in Peloponneſus. The Epirots ioyned all their forces with him: and by ſuch their willing readines, drew him to the ſiege of a Frontier peece, which they deſired to get into their owne hands: for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped ſhortly to make themſelues Maſters of Ambracia. There hee ſpent fortie dayes, ere he could end the buſines; which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Ætolia at his firſt comming in; it was thought that he might haue had an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon ſmall Townes or Forts: and not ſeldome, that the importunitie of Aſſociates, to haue their owne deſires fulfilled, cõuerts the preparatiõs of great Kings to thoſe vſes for which they neuer were intẽded; thereby hindering the proſecution of their maine deſſignes. Thus was our King Henrie the eight led aſide, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the ſiege of Tournay: at ſuch time as the French King Lewes the twelfth, hearing that the ſtrong Citie of Terwin was loſt, and that his Cauallerie, wherein reſted his chiefe confidence, two thouſand were beaten by the Earle of Eſſex with ſeuen hundred Engliſh; was thinking to withdraw himſelfe into Brittaine, in feare that Henrie would haue come to Paris.

The ſtay that Philip made at Ambracus, did wondrouſly embolden the Ætolians: in ſuch ſort, as their Prætor Scopas aduentured to leade all their forces out of the Countrey; and therewith not onely to ouer-runne Theſſalie, but to make impreſſion into Macedon. He ranne as farre as to Dium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Ægean Sea: which, being forſaken by the Inhabitants at his comming, He tooke, and razed to the ground. He ſpared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the reſt, he threw downe the Statu'as that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countreymen at his returne; foraſmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to bee growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponneſus, but euen to Macedon it ſelfe. But this their pride was ſoone abated; and they rewarded ſhortly at home in their owne Countrey, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip hauing diſpatched his worke at Ambracus, made a ſtrong inuaſion vpon Ætolia. He tooke Phoetia, Metropolis, Oeniade, Paanium, Eleus, and diuers other Townes and Caſtles of theirs: of which he burnt ſome, and fortified others. He alſo beat the Ætolians in ſundrie skirmiſhes; and waſted all the Countrie ouer, without receiuing any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Streights into Peloponneſus, and to doe the like ſpoile in the Countrey of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently ſollicited by the Achæan Embaſſadours: newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were ready with a great Armie to fall vpon the Countrie. Theſe Dardanians were a barbarous people, diuided by Mount Hamus from the Northerne part of Macedon, and were accuſtomed to ſeeke boory in that wealthy Kingdome, when they found their own times. Hauing therfore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a iourney into Peloponneſus; they purpoſed in his abſence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themſelues in his Countrey; as had beene their manner vpon the like aduantages. This made the King to diſmiſſe the Achæan Embaſſadours, (whom he ſhould haue accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them haue patience vntill another yeere. So Hee tooke his way homewards: and as hee was paſſing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaired vnto him Demetrius Pharius, with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romanes. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Doson, in the warres of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readie, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome vnto the Macedonian King: whose Counsailor he was euer after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie; and gaue ouer for the present their inuasion of Macedon, towards which they were alreadie on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessalie, whilest his people gathered in their Haruest. But the Ætolians rested not. They auenged themselues vpon the Epirots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they requited with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre vntill another yeere was laid aside: Philip stole a iournie into Peloponnesus, with fiue thousand Foot, and about foure hundred Horse. As soone as he was within Corinth; Hee commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word might be carried foorth of his arriuall. Hee sent priuily for old Aratus to come thither vnto him: with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, he would haue the Achæan Souldiors readie to meete him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrie, with somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse; little thinking to meet with such opposition. Indeede they had little cause to feare: since the Achæans themselues were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; vntill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Ætolians, and their fellowes, were by him surprised, and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which he did at his first comming, Philip got very much reputation and likewise he purchased both reputation and loue, by diuers actions immediately following. He won Psophis, an exceeding strong Town, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Ætolians then held. Hee wonne it by assault at his first comming: wherein it much auailed him, that the Enemie, not beleeuing that he would vndertake such a peece of worke at such an vnseasonable time of the yeere, was careless of prouiding euen such store of weapons, as might haue serued to defend it. The Towne was preserued by the King from sacke; and giuen to the Achæans, of his owne meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yeelded for very feare; hearing how easilie he had taken Psophis. This Towne also he gaue to the Achæans. The like liberality he vsed towards others; that had ancient title vnto places by him recouered. Then fell hee vpon the Countrie of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandrie, and liued abroad in Villages; euen such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the Citie of Olympia: where hauing done sacrifice to Iupiter, feasted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three daies; Hee proceeded on to the spoyle of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Ætolians, in the spoiles of their other-wise-deseruing neighbours. Great abundance of Cattaile hee tooke, with great numbers of slaues, and much wealth of all sorts, such as could bee found in rich villages. Then fell hee in hand with the Townes whereinto a great multitude of the Countrie-people were fledde. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yeelded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his iourney, by sending Embassadours to yeeld before he came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, tooke courage to set themselues at libertie, by seeing the King so neere; to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselues. And many places were spoyled by the Ætolian Captaines, because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King wonne more Townes in the Countrie, than the sharpenesse of Winter would suffer him to stay there dayes. Faine he would haue fought with the Ætolians: but they made such haste from him, that he could not ouertake them, till they had couered themselues within the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to haue beene safe. But Philip assaulted them therein so forcibly, that he made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their liues and armes. Hauing performed so much in this expedition, the King reposed himselfe a while in Megalopolis; and then remooued to Argos, where hee spent all the rest of the VVinter.

Before the Kings arriuall in Peloponnesus, the Lacedæmonians with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; and threatned to doe great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging ouer ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselues home. This Lycurgus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which hee could buy with money: so was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those iealousies, with which Vsurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall blood, that thinking himselfe to haue best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Common wealth. He wonne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephori as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his house: who perceiuing the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should giue account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto prædisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as euen whilst hee was vsing his best perswasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceiued whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So he liued afterwards among the Achæans a banished man, and hated of his owne people. As for Lycurgus, hee returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found meanes to driue out his fellow-King yong Agesipolis; whereby hee made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to bee suspected, in such sort as once he should haue beene apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might haue beene defended; yet rather than to aduenture himselfe into iudgement, he chose to flie for a time, and soiourne among his friends the Ætolians. His wel-knowne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weakenesse of their owne surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, Hee tooke better heed vnto himselfe; not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they listed. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant: or at what time it was, that he chased Agesipolis out of the Cities; I doe not certainely finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three vsurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to bee placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three very iustly deserued. Whatsoeuer he was toward some priuate Citizens: in the warre against Philip, He behaued himselfe as a prouident man, and carefull of his Countreis good.

§. II.

How Philip was misaduised by ill Counsailors: who afterwards wrought treason against him; and were iustly punished. He inuadeth the Ætolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted vnto them.

WHilest the King lay at Argos, deuising vpon his businesse for the yeare following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently for their owne greatnesse, as they were like to haue spoiled all that hee tooke in hand. Antigonus Doson had left vnto Philip such Counsailors, as to him did seeme the fittest men for gouerning of his youth. The chiefe of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his person, and also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, thought that hee should doe a notable peece of seruice to his Prince; if hee could reduce the Achæans vnto the same degree of subiection, wherein the Macedonians liued. To bring this to passe; during the late Expedition he had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achæans out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the bootie that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, Hee was bold to chastice some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to helpe their fellowes; them he laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby hee thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that they should bee qualified with an habite of blind obedience; and thinke nothing vniust that pleased the King. But these Achæans were tenderly sensible in matters of libertie: whereof if they could haue beene contented to suffer any little little diminution, they needed not haue troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the warre against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselues vnto olde Aratus; and besought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not be oppressed by degrees. Aratus foorthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty, than at first it might seeme. The King bestowed gracious words vpon those that had beene wronged; and forbade Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choller for a time. He thought so well of his owne Proiect, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable seruice, in businesse of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in biting at the taile, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be than that among the Achæans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court; promising to become their especiall friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as hee continued to make much of Aratus, he must be faine to deale precisely with the Achæans, and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to giue countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Achæans, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickely brought to conforme themselues vnto the duety of obedient Subiects. By such perswasions, he drew the King to be present at Ægium, where the Achæans were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would haue bin needfull in a businesse of more importance; the King by faire words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new fauourites, was chosen Prætor, instead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patræ and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garrison yeelded it vp for feare, at his first comming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymæans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrey the last Winter, hee had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that vndertooke to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and ioyne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to doe, he willed Amphidamus to let them vnderstand, That hee would render vnto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrein inuasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept vnder by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might haue done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countrey: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before ouer-hastie to beleeue such faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitour, and one that was set on worke for no other end, than to breede a mutuall diffidence betweene them and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him prisoner into Ætolia. But he perceiued their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himselfe; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was sayd) maruailing what should be the cause, that he heard no newes from the Ælians, concerning the offers which hee had made vnto them by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsailor, thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus. He sayd that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he sayd it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out: For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arati, (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside and giuen him to vnderstand, that it would be very preiudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lie; deuised by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he sent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearse it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already conuicted. And when hee had ſaid all he reſt, ere either Philip or they ſpake any word; He added this clauſe as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you ſuch vngratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achæans; and therein hauing made it know what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leaue you to your ſelues. Old Aratus grauely admoniſhed the King; That whenſoeuer hee heard any accuſation, eſpecially againſt a friend of his owne or a man of worth, He ſhould forbeare a while to giue credit, vntill he had diligently examined the buſineſſe. For ſuch deliberation was Kingly, and he ſhould neuer thereof repent him. At the preſent hee ſaid there needed no more, than to call in thoſe that had heard his talke with Amphidamus, and eſpecially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very abſurd thing, That the King ſhould make himſelfe the Authour of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and ſaid that he would make ſufficient inquirie. So paſſed a few dayes: wherein whileſt Apelles delaied to bring in the proofe, which indeed he wanted; Amphidamus came from Elis, and tolde what had befalne him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conſpiracy of the Arati: which when he found no better than a meere deuice againſt his honourable friends; He entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby ſomewhat cooled; yet by meanes of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remiſſion therein could be diſcerned.

The vnreſtfull temper of Apelles, hauing with much vehemencie brought nothing to paſſe; began (as commonly Ambition vſeth) to ſwell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. He betakes himſelfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with thoſe of the vulgar, he had prepared a ſnare for the Arati; ſo fayling of them, he thinkes it wiſedome to lay for the King himſelfe, and for all at once which were about him. In ſuch manner ſometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimnie; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too ſtrong to bee caught and held by the ſubtile workemanſhip of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponneſus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithfull men, and ſuch as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the Targuetiers, and Megaleas chiefe of the Secretaries, were eaſily wonne to be at Apelles his diſpoſition. This politician therefore ſtudied how to remooue the other two from their places, and put ſome Creatures of his owne into their roomes. Againſt Alexander Hee went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumniation and priuie detraction. But for the ſupplanting of Taurion he vſed more fineneſſe; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill ſpare from being alwaies in his preſence. By ſuch Art hee thought to haue remoued him, as we ſay, Out of Gods bleſſing into a warme Sunne. In the meane ſeaſon Aratus retired himſelfe; and ſought to auoid the dangerous friendſhip of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately choſen by ſuch vehement inſtance of the King; Hee was a man of no diſpatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deale of time was loſt, whileſt Philip wanted both the money and the Corne, wherewith hee ſhould haue beene furniſhed by the Achæans. This made the King vnderſtand his owne errour, which he wiſely ſought to reforme betimes. Hee perſwaded the Achæans to remoume their Parliament from Ægium, to Sycion the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his ſonne: perſwading them to forget what was paſt, and laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth hee intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of theſe worthy men, He eaſily obtained what he would of the Achæans. Fifty talents they gaue him out of hand, with great ſtore of Corne: and further decreed, That ſo long as hee himſelfe in perſon followed the warres in Peloponneſus, hee ſhould receiue ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to prouide ſhipping, that ſo he might inuade the Etolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime people, at his pleaſure, and hinder their excurſions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond meaſure, to ſee things goe forward ſo well without his helpe; euen by the miniſtery of thoſe whom he moſt hated. Wherefore he entred into conſpiracie with Leontius and Megaleas: binding himſelfe and them by Oath, to croſſe and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of ability to doe any thing without them; should make him speake them faire; and bee glad to submit himselfe to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilest he was a child, and therefore these wise men perswaded themselues, that, by looking bigge vpon him, and imputing vnto him all that fell out ill through their own misgouernement of his affaires, they might rule him as a childe still. Apelles would needes goe to Chalcis, there to take order for the prouisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two staid behinde with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked oath, than of their dutie.

His fleet and Armie being in a readinesse: Philip made countenance, as if hee would haue bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Ætolians sent men, little fearing that the mischiefe would haue fallen as soone after it did, vpon themselues. But against the Eleans and those that came to helpe them, Philip thought it enough to leaue the Achæans, with some part of his and their Mercinaries. Hee himselfe with the body of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Ile of Cephallenia: whence the Ætolians dwelling ouer against it, vsed to furnish themselues of shipping, when they went to rowe abroad. There he besieged the Towne of Palæa, that had beene very seruiceable to the Enemie against him and his Confederates; and might be very vse-full to him, if hee could get it. Whilest he lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fifteene shippes of warre from Scerdilaidas; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts saue one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith hee ouerthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leontius Captaine of the Targetiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembring his couenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbeare to doe his best; and caused others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foyle, and many slaine, not of the worst souldiers, but such as had gotten ouer the breach, and would haue carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedie; and therefore he thought vpon breaking vp the siege. For it was easier vnto the Townes men to make vp the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilest he stood thus perplexed and vncertaine what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard vpon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their owne Countrey. The Messenians alleadged, that Lycurgus was busie in wasting their Countrey: vpon whom the King might come vnawares in one day; the Etesian windes which then blew, serving fitly for his Nauigation. Heereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would easily carry him thither, so would they detaine him there perforce (blowing all the Dogge-dayes) and make him spend the Summer to small or no purpose. But Aratus gaue better counsaile, and preuailed. He shewed how vnfitting it were, to let the Ætolians ouer-runne all Thessalie againe, and some part of Macedon, whilest the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small aduentures. Rather, hee said, that the time now serued well to carrie the warre into Aetolia; since the Prætor was gone thence abroad on rouing, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lycurgus; he was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Achæans were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King sets sayle for Ætolia; and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which diuided the Aetolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and ioyned with him as many of them as could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. He marched vp into the in-land Countrey: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retrait; He passed on to Thermum, which was the Receptacle of the Aetolians, and surest place of defence in all extremities. The Countrey round about was a great Fastnesse, enuironed with rockie Mountaines of very narrow, steepe, and difficult ascent. There did the Aetolians vse to hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their solemne games. There also they vsed to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest securitie. This opinion of the naturall strength, had made them careleſse in looking vnto it. When Philip therefore had ouercome the bad way, there was nothing else to do than to take spoile:

whereof he found such plentie, that he thought the paines of his iourney well recompenced. So he loaded his Armie: and consuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chiefe of all belonging vnto the Aetolians; in remembrance of their like courtesie, shewed vpon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue beene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Mounsieur du Gourgues the French Captaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Aetolians laid for him: which that they would doe, he beleeued before; and therefore was not taken vnawares: Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush fell vpon his skirts: but hee had laid a Counter-ambush for them of his Illyrians; who staying behinde the rest, did set vpon the backes of the Aetolians, whilest they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with slaughter of the enemie, hee returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Countrey round about him, Hee safely carried all that he had gotten aboard his Fleet. Once the Aetolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Stratus in great brauerie. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The ioy of this victorious Expedition being euery way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast vnto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were inuited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleas. They came, because they could not choose: but their heauy lookes argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperity. It grieued them to thinke, that they should bee able to giue no better account vnto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; since Apelles himselfe, as will be shewed anon, had plaied his owne part with a most mischieuous dexteritie. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reuiling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great vprore; many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truely informed of all that had passed. Which made him send for Leontius and his fellowes. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder, and they, to giue him froward answeres: in somuch as they said at length, That they would neuer giue ouer, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischiefe as hee deserued. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heeles: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands vpon Megaleas, yea and to cast him into prison? Why, said the King, it was euen I. This resolute answere, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angrie; seeing himselfe out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedie the matter. Shortly after Megaleas was called forth to his answere, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victorie at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no lesse touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answeres thereto so weake; that he, and Crinon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twentie Talents: Crinon being remanded backe to prison, and Leontius becomming Bayle for Megaleas. This was done vpon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as hee was at Corinth, he tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacedamonians. These and the Eleans had done what harme they could in Peloponnesus, whilest the King was absent. The Achaans had opposed them as well as they could; with ill successe, yet so, as they hindered them from doing such harme as else they would haue done. But when Philip came, he ouer-ran the Countrey about Lacedamon: and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleeue that he was returned out of Aetolia. He tooke not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waste in the fieldes: and hauing beaten the enemie in some skirmishes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich bootie of Cattell, slaues, and other Countrie-spoile. At Corinth he found attending him, Embassadours from the Rhodians and Chians: that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Aetolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deale first with the Aetolians; who if they would make the same request, should not finde him vnreasonable. The Ætolians had sped ill that yeare: neither saw they any likely hopes for the yeares following. The Army that they had sent foorth to waste Thessaly and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had beene grieuously afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes against them, and their weake Allies the Eleans and Lacedæmonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should bee able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keepe the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætolians readily entertained this negotiation of Peace: and taking truce for thirty daies with the king, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his presence at a Diet of their nation, that should be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should find them conformable to any good reason.

Aetolians

Whilest these things were in hand, Leontius and Megaleas thought to haue terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this deuice sorted to no good effect. The souldiers were easily and quickly incensed against many of the kings friends, who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a noyse, and breaking open of doores, without further harme done. This was enough to informe the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea the souldiers themselues, repenting of their insolence, desired to haue the Authors of the tumult sought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if hee had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megaleas were afraide, lest the matter would soone come out of it selfe to their extreame danger. Wherefore they sent vnto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treason; requesting him speedily to repayre vnto Corinth, where hee might stand betweene them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while beene wanting to the businesse, vndertaken by him and his treacherous companions. Hee had taken vpon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was he growne into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessalie addressed themselues vnto him, and receiued from him their dispatch in euery businesse. Likewise the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles, making slight mention (onely for fashions sake) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogancie of this great man, in setting himselfe out vnto the people: but in mannaging the Kings affaires, hee made it his speciall care, that mony, and all things needfull for the publique seruice, should be wanting. Yea he enforced the King, for very needs, to sell his owne Plate and houshold vessels: thinking to resolue these and all other difficulties, by onely saying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the King would giue assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his iourney from Chalcis in the Isle of Eubœa, to the citty of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pompe and royaltie, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers, which Leontius and Megaleas drew forth to meet him on the way. So entring the citty with a goodly traine, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspition of his falshood. Wherefore one was sent to tel him, that he should wait a while, or come another time; for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him saue his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of priuacie, he vsed him not at all. This taught Megaleas to look to himselfe, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent foorth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to do some piece of seruice, but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signifie what was befallen him: and they foorthwith sent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were obiected against him, hee might not be called forth to triall before their returne: as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they said they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiers made Philip more hastie than else he would haue beene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which hee wrote vnto the Ætolians; vilifying the King with opprobrious words; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was euen ready to sinke vnder the burden of his owne pouertie. By this the King vnderstood more perfectly the falshood, not onely of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megaleas that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison, wherein all of them shortly ended their liues. Megaleas also, neither daring to stand to triall, nor knowing whither to flie, was weary of his owne life, and slew himselfe about the same time.

The Ætolians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this yong Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their ouerthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Neuertheless being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold vpon all aduantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megaleas, together with some indignation thereupon conceiued by some of the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing sorie. For being in good hope throughly to tame this vnquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning & continuing the warre should rest vpon themselues. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for war against the yeere following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified hee his Macedonian souldiours, by yeelding to let them winter in their owne Countrie. In his returne homward, he called into iudgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therfore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment: yet now they thinke the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vse to build, in their fauour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won some bordering Townes; from which the Dardanians, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdome: when hee had thus prouided for safety of his owne; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embassadors from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolemie King of Ægypt, and from the Citie of Byzantium, recontinuing the former sollicitation about the Peace. This fashion had been taken vp in matters of Greece, euer since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to set the whole Countrie at libertie: No sooner was any Prouince or Citie in danger to be oppressed and subdued by force of warre, but presently there were found intercessors, who pittying the effusion of Greekish bloud, would importune the stronger to relinquish his aduantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad sought to binde vnto them those people, that were howsoeuer weake in numbers, yet very good souldiors. But heereby it came to passe, that the more froward sort, especially the Ætolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falsehood and robberie, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their Neighbours: being well assured, that if they had the worst, The loue of Greece would be sufficient for to redeeme their quiet. They had, since the late Treatie of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Achæans, and standing in feare to bee more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly then before, to make an end of the Warre as soone as they might. Philip made such answere vnto the Embassadours, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue not occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present afraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it: but that the Ætolians, if they had a desire to liue in rest, must first bee dealt withall, to signifie plainely their determination, whereto himselfe would returne such answere as he should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the middest of this Negotiation, that he was aduertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battaile at Thrasymene. These letters hee communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian Warre. Heereby he grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Ætolians, which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an Ætolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing Warre betweene themselues, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians, had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith looke Eastward, and seeke by all meanes to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrie should be at peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of warre, should lay hold on the opportunitie, now fitly seruing, to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italie.

Such aduice could the Ætolians then giue, when they stood in feare of danger threatning them at hand: but being soone after weary of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselues by pillage, they were so farre from obseruing and following their own good counsell, that they inuited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselues and the whole Countrie, (but themselues before any other part of the Country) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That euery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betweene Hannibal and Philip.

THis being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselues to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the businesse of Italie, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Canna: after which he ioyned in league with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to be auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise beene farre more expedient for Philip, to haue supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, hee should perhaps haue brought them to peace vpon some equall termes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The issue of the counsaile which hee followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Ætolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon such Conditions that might easily be broken: haue beene related in another place, as belonging vnto the second Punicke Warre. Wherefore I will onely heere set downe the tenour of the League betweene Him and Carthage: which may seeme not vnworthy to be read, if onely in regard of the forme it selfe then vsed; though it had beene ouer-long to haue beene inserted into a more busie peece.

The Oath and Couenants betweene Hannibal, Generall of the Carthaginians, and Xenophanes, Embassador of Philip King of Macedon.

THIS is the League ratified by oath, which Hannibal the Generall, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as also the Senators of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Armie, haue made with Xenophanes the sonne of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the sonne of Demetrius hath sent vnto vs, for himselfe and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Iupiter, and Iuno, and Apollo: before † The God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolaus, before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Armes, the Sunne, the Moone, and the Earth; before Riuers and Meddowes, and Waters; before all the Gods, that haue power ouer Carthage; before all the Gods that rule ouer Macedon, and the rest of Greece; before all the Gods that are Presidents of Warre, and present at the making of this League. Hannibal the Generall hath said, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Armie: Be it agreed betweene You and Vs, that this Oath stand for friendship and louing affection, that We become friends, familiar, and brethren, Vpon Couenant, that the safety of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the Generall and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Prouinces of the Carthaginians vsing the same Lawes, and of the Vicans, & as many Cities & Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiors and Associates, and of all Townes and Nations with which We hold friendship in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, and with whom we shall hold friendship or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preserued by King Philip and the Macedonians, and such of the Greekes as are their Associates. In like manner shall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greekes his Associates, be saued and preserued by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Vicans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italie, Gaule and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter ioyne with Vs in Italie. Wee shall not take counsaile one against the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. With all readinesse and good will, without deceit or subtletie, We shall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Towns, and Hauens, with which we haue alreadie league and friendship. Wee also shall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which wee haue already league and friendship. The warre that we haue with the Romans, haue Ye also with them, vntill the Gods shall giue vs a new and happie end. Yee shall aid Vs with those things whereof wee haue need, and shall doe according to the Couenants betweene Vs. But if the Gods shall not giue vnto You and Vs their helpe in this warre against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer friendship, Wee shall make friendship in such wise that Yee shall be partakers of the same friendship, with Condition, That they shall not haue power to make warre vpon you: Neither shall the Romans be Lords ouer the Corcyraans, nor ouer those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor ouer Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They shall also render vnto Demetrius Pharius all those that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romanes Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make warre vpon Ye or Vs; Wee will succour one another in that warre, as either shall haue need. The same shall be obserued in warre made by any other, excepting those Kings, Cities, and States, with whom wee hold alreadie league and friendship. To this league if We or Ye shall thinke fit to adde or detract, such addition or detraction shall be made by our common consent.

§. IIII.

How Philip yeelded to his naturall vices being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize vpon the free States his Associates: With the troubles, into which hee thereby fell, whilest he bore a part in the second Punick warre. He poysoneth Aratus: and growes hatefull to the Achæans.

Hitherto Philip had carried himselfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisedome, hee might haue offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatnesse of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrie. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath beene said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires: and thereby shortly gouerned him as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudy, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what he listed, and not otherwise listing to doe what he ought, than so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should helpe to serue his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before hee should busie himselfe in Italie, hee thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates vnder a more absolute forme of subiection. Hereunto Apelles had aduised him before: and hee had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boysterour Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deepely wronged if he might not wholly haue his owne way, but were driuen to await the Kings opportunity at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obserue the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reines in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore hee grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could neuer doe.

There arose about these times a very hote Faction among the Messenians, betweene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diuerted (as happens often after a forrein warre) vnto domesticall obiects, than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In processe of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resoluing so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth striue any more about their Gouernment: for that hee would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his comming thither, hee found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherefore hee consulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in priuate with such of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the insolence of the vnrulie Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselues to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselues from Tyrants. Thus whilest each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, ere that hee were gone that should countenance their doings. The Gouernours therefore would haue apprehended some seditious Orators, that were, they said, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the people tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemes, that it would be easie to worrie the sheepe, when the Dogges their guardians were slaine. But his falshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbeare, to tell him of it in publike, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But hauing already done more then was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should neede the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as hee could. He ledde olde Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Messene. There hee pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne vse; forthat it was of notable strength, and would serue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadell of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Countrie. Whilest hee was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrailes of the beast deliuered into his hands, as was the manner; Hee shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would haue soothed him a little; were it onely for desire to make amends, for the angry words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answere, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou be a Southsayer, thou maist goe thy waies, and let slip this good aduantage; If thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus he spake; resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vnto the two hornes of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needes heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainely, That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, He must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especialy the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his souldiers, and keepe men in dutie, as he had done hitherto, by their owne good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduice Philip yeelded at the present: but not without some dislike, thenceforth growing betweene Him and the Arati; whom he thought more froward than beseemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as he plainely discouered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceiued, that in resorting to his house, He had beene dishoneſt with his sonnes wife. He therfore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despight of Cleomenes, his owne Countriman, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him company. In this journy he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him; That vnhoneſt counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But Hee would needes haue them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his Will, He seized vpon their Towne of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; hauing no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what he listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to help them. Thus in stead of setling the country, as his intended Voyage into Italie required: He kindled a fire in it which he could neuer quench, vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whilest hee was thus labouring to binde the hands that should haue fought for him in Italie: M. Valerius the Romane came into those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Aetolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre; the occurrents whereof wee haue related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In mannaging whereof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leisure serued, He made it apparant that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the libertie of the Messenians; but made another iourney into their Country, with hope to deceiue them, as before. They vnderstood him better now than before; and therefore were not hasty to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, He went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies, inuaded them with open Warre. But in that warre he could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this attempt vpon Messene he lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsailor and Flatterer, not his peruerter; as appeares by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that hee sped, the more angry hee waxed against those that seemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the ministery of Taurion, his Lieutenant, he poysoned olde Aratus; and shortly after that he poysoned also the yonger Aratus: hoping that these things would neuer haue beene knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poysons themselues were more sure than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed vnto

Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Proceſſions, to be celebrated euery yeere twice, with a Prieſt ordained vnto him for that purpoſe; as was accuſtomed vnto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to be tranſlated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are ſaid to haue beene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to haue beene true; ſince the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increaſe of Idolatrie.

The louing memorie of Aratus their Patron, and ſingular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Achæans a maruellous diſlike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He ſhall therfore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counſaile for themſelues. At the preſent, the murder was not generally knowne or beleeued: neither were they in caſe to ſubſiſt, without his helpe that had committed it. The Ætolians were a moſt outragious people, great darers, and ſhameleſſe robbers. With theſe the Romans made a league: whereof the Conditions were ſoone divulged, eſpecially that maine point, concerning the diuiſion of the purchaſe which they ſhould make, namely, That the Ætolians ſhould haue the country and Townes; but the Romans the ſpoyle, and carry away the people to ſell for ſlaues. The Achæans, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make ſtreight alliance with the Ætolians, as knowing their vnciuill diſpoſition; were much the more auerſe from them, when they perceiued how they had called in the Barbarians (for ſuch did the Greekes account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauocke of the Country. The ſame conſideration mooued alſo the Lacedæmonians, to ſtand off a while, before they would declare themſelues for the Ætolians, whoſe friendſhip they had embraced in the late warre. The induſtry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he ſeemed to take of the Achæans his Confederates, ſufficed to retaine them: eſpecially at ſuch time, as their owne neceſſitie was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged vnto himſelfe the Dymæans, by an ineſtimable benefit: recouering their Towne, after it had beene taken by the Romans and Ætolians; and redeeming their people whereſoeuer they might be found, that had been carried away Captiue, and ſold abroad for ſlaues. Thus might he haue blotted out the memorie of offences paſt; if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and giuen men to vnderſtand; that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which cauſed him to make ſuch a ſhew of goodneſſe. Among other foule acts, whereof hee was not aſhamed; He tooke Polycratia the wife of the yonger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might ſerue to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of ſuch faults he ſhall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the ſecond time: for of that which hapned in this their firſt Inuaſion, I holde it ſuperfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of Philopœmen Generall of the Achæans: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedæmon. A battaile betweene them, wherein Mechanidas is ſlaine.

IT happens often, that the diſeaſe of one eminent man diſcouers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there ſtood vp Philopœmen: whoſe notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Achæans redoubtable among all the Greekes, and careleſſe of ſuch protection, as in former times they had needed againſt the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopœmen: who being then a yong man, and hauing no command; did eſpeciall ſeruice to Antigonus at the battaile of Sellaſia againſt Cleomenes. Thence forward vntill now he had ſpent the moſt part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and ſeldome or neuer at peace betweene themſelues; He bettered among them his knowledge and practice in the Art of warre. At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horſe: wherein he carried himſelfe ſo ſtrictly, trauailing with all the Cities of the Confederacie to haue his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as alſo hee ſo diligentlie trained them vp in all exerciſe of ſeruice that hee made the Achæans very ſtrong in that part of their forces. Being afterward choſen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, Hee had no leſſe care to reforme their militarie diſcipline throughout, whereby his Countrie might be ſtrong enough to defend it ſelfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others. Hee perſwaded the Achæans to cut off their vaine

expence of brauerie, in apparell, houſhold ſtuffe, and curious fare, and to beſtow that coſt vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by ſo much were they like to proue the better Souldiers, and ſuteable in behauiour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had ſerued hitherto with little light Bucklers, and ſlender Darts, to caſt afarre off; that were vſefull in skirmiſhing at ſome diſtance, or for Surpriſes, or ſuddaine and haſtie Expeditions; whereto Aratus had beene moſt accuſtomed. But when they came to handie ſtrokes, they were good for nothing ſo long as they were wholly driuen to relie vpon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopœmen altered this: cauſing them to arme themſelues more weightily, to vſe a larger kind of ſhield, with good ſwords, and ſtrong pikes, fit for ſeruice at hand. He taught them alſo to fight in cloſe orders and altered the forme of their embattailing: not making the Files ſo deepe as had beene accuſtomed, but extending the Front, that he might vſe the ſeruice of many hands.

Eight Moneths were ſpent of that yeere, in which he firſt was Prætor of the Achæans; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedæmon cauſed him to make tryall, how his Souldiers had profited by his diſcipline. This Machanidas was the ſucceſſor vnto Lycurgus; a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a ſtrong Armie of Mercenaries: and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta; but to holde the Citie in obedience to himſelfe perforce. Wherefore it behoued him not to take part with the Achæans, that were fauourers of liberty; but to ſtrengthen himſelfe by friendſhip of the Ætolians: who, in making Alliances, tooke no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people alſo of Lacedæmon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argiues, Achæans, and Macedonians; were in like ſort (all or moſt of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very vnwiſely. For in ſeeking to take reuenge vpon thoſe, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordſhip of Peloponneſus; they hindred themſelues thereby from recouering the Maſtrie of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his owne ſecuritie, and no ſmall hope of good that would follow, ſuffered not Machanidas to be idle; but alwaies made him redie to fall vpon his neighbours backes, and take of theirs what hee could, whileſt they were enforced, by greater neceſſitie, to turne face another way. Thus had he often done, eſpecially in the abſence of Philip: whoſe ſudden comming into thoſe parts, or ſome other oppoſition made againſt him, had vſually made him faile of his attempts. At the preſent He was ſtronger in men, than were the Achæans; and thought his owne men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whileſt Philip therefore was buſied elſe-where, he entred the Countrey of the Mantineans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the * Lordſhip of Peloponneſus, as hauing ſtronger friendes, and weaker oppoſition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertaine him at Mantinæa; where was fought betweene them a great battaile. The Tyrant had brought into the field vpon Cartes a great many of Engins; where with to beat vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in diſorder. To preuent this danger, Philopœmen ſent foorth his light armature a good way before him; ſo as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To ſecond theſe, from the one and the other ſide came in continuall ſupply; till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achæans and of Machanidas, were drawne vp to the fight: being ſo farre aduanced, each before their owne Phalanx, that it could no otherwiſe be diſcerned which preſſed forward, or which recoyled, than by riſing of the duſt. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made vnſeruiceable, by the interpoſition of his owne men; in ſuch manner as the Canon is hindered from doing execution, in moſt of the battailes fought in theſe our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant preuailed at length: not onely by their aduantage of number, but (as Polybius well obſerueth) by ſurmounting their oppoſites in degree of courage; wherein vſually the hired ſouldiers of Tyrants exceed thoſe that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which liue oppreſſed by Tyrannie, ſince the one, by doing their beſt in fight, haue hope to acquire ſomewhat beneficiall to themſelues, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) to aſſure their owne ſeruitude: ſo the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruites of his proſperitie, haue good cauſe to maintaine his quarrell as their owne; whereas they that ſerue vnder a free State, haue no other motiue to doe manfully, than their bare ſtipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the victorie: many Companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are preſently caſt;

and therefore such good fellowes will not take much paines to bring the war to an end. But the victorie of a Tyrant, makes him stand in need of more such helpers: because that after it he doth wrong to more, as hauing more subiects; and therefore stands in feare of more, that should seeke to take reuenge vpon him. The stipendaries therefore of the Achæans, being forced to giue ground, were vrged so violently in their retrait by those of Machanidas, that shortly they betooke themselues to flight; and could not be staid by any perswasions of Philopœmen, but ranne away quite beyond the battaile of the Achæans. This disaster had beene sufficient to take from Philopœmen the honour of the day; had he not wisely obserued the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that errour which might restore the victorie The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gaue chace vnto those that fled: leauing behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedæmonians; whom he thought sufficient to deale with the Achæans, that were already disheartened by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of sight; Philopœmen aduanced towards the Lacedæmonians that stood before him. There lay betweene them athwart the Countrie a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedæmonians aduentured ouer it, as thinking themselues better souldiers than the Achæans; who had in a manner alreadie lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaile; and had no sooner the foremost of them recouered the further banke, than they were stoutly charged by the Achæans, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first rankes being broken, all the rest beganne to shrinke: so as Philopœmen getting ouer the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopœmen knew better how to vse his aduantage, than Machanidas had done. Hee suffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chase: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come backe. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chace, looked very heauily when hee saw what was fallen out, Yet with a lustie Troupe of Horse about him Hee made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Achæans in disorder; and to set vpon their backes, as they were carelesly pursuing their victorie. But when he and his companie saw Philopœmen ready to make good the bridge against them; then beganne euery one to looke, which way hee might shift for himselfe. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his companie, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage ouer. He was easily discouered by his purple Cassocke, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopœmen therefore leauing the charge of the bridge to another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it selfe, as hee was getting ouer it, slew him there with his owne hand. There dyed in this Battaile of the Lacedæmonians side about foure thousand: and more than foure thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achæan Mercenaries, probable it is that the losse was not greatly cared for; since that Warre was at an end, and for their money they might hire more when they should haue need.

§. VI.

Philip hauing peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bythinia; and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victorie the Achæans learned to thinke well of themselues. Neither needed they indeed after a while (such was their discipline, and continuall exercise) to account themselues in matter of war inferiour to any, that should haue brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonian, He made no great vse of them: but when hee had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians, Hee studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. Hee tooke in hand many matters together, or very neerely together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Achæans would haue done him seruice; they must, by helping him to oppresse others that neuer had wronged him, haue taught him the way how to deale with themselues. Hee greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had ioyned with the Romans and Ætolians in war against him.

This

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Noble-man, otherwise than as hee was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Philetærus his Vncle: who being guelded, by reason of a mishap which he had when hee was a childe, grew afterwards thereby to be the more esteemed: as great men in those times reposed much confidence in Eunuches, whose affections could not bee obliged vnto wiues or children. He was entertained into the familie of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, hee accompanied his Master, that betooke himselfe to Lysimachus King of Thrace. Lysimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his money and accompts. But when at length he stood in feare of this King, that grew a bloudie Tyrant: He fled into Asia, where he seized vpon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lysimachus. The Towne and monie, together with his owne seruice, Hee offered vnto Seleuchus the first, that then was ready to giue Lysimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but neuer performed; for that Seleuchus hauing slaine Lysimachus, dyed shortly after himselfe, before he made vse of Philetærus or his monie. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus with the Countrie round about it; and reigned therein twentie yeeres as an absolute King. He had two brethren: of which the elder is said to haue beene a poore Carter; and the yonger perhaps not much better; before such time they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetærus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his aduantage of the dissention, betweene Seleuchus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the sonnes of the second Antiochus. He fought a battell with Hierax, nere vnto Sardes, and won the victory. At which time, to animate his men against the Gaules that serued vnder his Enemy, he vsed a prety deuice. He wrote the word * Victorie vpon the hand of his Soothsayer, in such colours as would easily come off: and when the hote liuer of the beast that was sacrifised, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He published this vnto his Armie as a Miracle, plainely foreshewing that the gods would be assistant in that Battaile.

After this victorie, he grew a dreadfull enemie to Seleucus: who neuer durst attempt to recouer from him, by Warre, the Territorie that he had gotten and held. Finally, when he had reigned two and twentie yeeres, hee died by a surfet of ouer-much drinke; and left his Kingdome to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was sonne vnto Attalus the yongest brother of Philetærus. Attalus was an vndertaking Prince, very bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his owne proper forces He restored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence he had beene expelled. He was grieuously molested by Acheus: who setting vp himselfe as King against Antiochus the great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was besieged in his owne City of Pergamus: but by the help of the Tectosages, a Nation of the Gaules, whom he called ouer out of Thrace, Hee recouered all that he had lost. When these Gaules had once gotten footing in Asia, they neuer wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interposed themselues, without inuitation, and found themselues worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his warre against Byzantium. Whereunto when he had condescended; they neuertheless within a while after inuaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victorie; and vsed it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increasing; they occupied the Region about Hellespont: where, in seating themselues, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuertheless, presuming afterwards vpon their strength; they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus than to any that had worse deserued of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselues within the bounds of that Prouince, which tooke name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppresse the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill vp the Armies of those, that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posterity of such, as had saued themselues and their Prouinces, in the slothfull reigne of the Persians; or in the busie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the first of their line had married with Atossa, sister vnto the great King Cyrus. Their Country was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the son of that King, whom Perdiccas crucified, eſpying his time while the Macedonians were at ciuill warres among themſelus; recouered his dominion, and paſſed it ouer to his off-ſpring. The Kings of Pontus had alſo their beginning from the Perſian Empire; and are ſaid to haue iſſued from the royall houſe of Achamenes. The Paphlagonians deriued themſelues from Pylemenes, a King that aſſiſted Priamus at the warre of Troy. Theſe, applying themſelues vnto the times, were alwayes conformable vnto the ſtrongeſt. The Anceſtors of Pruſias had begun to reigne in Bythinia, ſome few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay ſomewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, hauing other employment, they were the leſſe moleſted. Galantus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Countrie; where hee was vanquiſhed. They had afterwards to doe with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them ſomewhat more humble. And thus they ſhufled, as did the reſt, vntill the reigne of Pruſias, whom we haue alreadie ſometimes mentioned.

Perdiccas

§. VII.

The Towne of Cios taken by Philip, at the inſtance of Pruſias King of Bithynia, and cruelly deſtroyed. By this and like actions, Philip growes hatefull to many of the Greekes: and is warred vpon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

Pruſias as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whoſe greatneſſe he ſuſpected. He therefore ſtrengthened himſelfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrarie ſide, entred into a ſtrict Confederacie with the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Ætolian warre, and was deuiſing with Antiochus about ſharing betweene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolomie Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his ſonne Ptol. Epiphanes a yong childe his heire; the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Aſia, there to winne the Towne of the Ciani, and beſtow it vpon him. Pruſias had no right vnto the Towne, nor iuſt matter of quarrell againſt it: but it was fitly ſeated for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came; as one that could not well denie to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby he mightily offended no ſmall part of Greece. Embaſſadours came to him whileſt he lay at the ſiege, from the Rhodians, and diuers other States: entreating him to forſake the Enterpriſe. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwiſe gentle anſwers: making ſhew as if he would condeſcend to their requeſt, when he intended nothing leſſe. At length he got the Towne: where, euen in preſence of the Embaſſadours, of whoſe ſollicitation hee had ſeemed ſo regardfull, He omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby hee rendred himſelfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Eſpecially his fact was deteſted of the Rhodians, who had made vehement interceſſion for the poore Ciani: and were aduertiſed by Embaſſadors of purpoſe ſent vnto them from Philip, That, howſoeuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as ſoone as he liſted: yet in regard of his loue to the Rhodians, Hee was contented to giue it ouer. And by this his clemencie, the Embaſſadours ſaid, that he would manifeſt vnto the world, what ſlanderous tongues they were; which noyſed abroad ſuch reports, as went of his falſhood and oppreſſion. Whileſt the Embaſſadours were declaming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came ſome that made a true relation of what had hapned: ſhewing that Philip had ſacked and deſtroyed the Towne of Cios, and, after a cruell ſlaughter of the Inhabitants, had made ſlaues of all that eſcaped the ſword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great deſpite, no leſſe were the Ætolians inflamed againſt him: ſince they had ſent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lyſimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawne from their Confederacie to his owne) what little truſt was to be repoſed in the faith of this King. But moſt of all others was Attalus moued with conſideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his owne eſtate. He had much to loſe; and was not without hope of getting much if he could make a ſtrong Partie in Greece. He had already, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchaſing with much liberalitie the loue of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, hauing loſt their owne. On the friendſhip of the Ætolians hee had cauſe to preſume; hauing bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhoaians that were were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States: he easily drew into a streight alliance with him, by their hatred newly conceiued against Philip.

Vpon confidence in these his friends, but most of all, in the ready assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open warre. It had beene vnseasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemy tended; since his desire to fasten vpon Asia was manifest, and his falshood no lesse manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not farre from Chios, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driuen to runne his owne shippe on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admirall of the Rhodians tooke his deaths wound: and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour vnder a Promontorie, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the wracks vpon the shoare: Yet forasmuch as he had suffered far greater losse of ships and men, than had the Enemy: and since he durst not in few dayes after put foorth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adiudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards besieged and wonne some Townes in Caria: whether only in a brauery, and to despight his opposites; or whether vpon any hopefull desire of conquest, it is vncertain. The stratageme, by which he wonne Prinassus, is worthy of noting. He attempted it by a Myne: and finding the Earth so stony, that it resisted his worke; he neuertheless commanded the Pioners to make a noise vnder ground; and secretly in the night-time he raised great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the besieged, that the worke went maruellously forward. At length he sent word to the Townes-men, that by his vnder-mining, two acres of their wall stood onely vpon woodden proppes, to which if hee gaue fire, and entred by a breach, they should expect no mercy. The Prinassians little thought, that hee had fetcht all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise vp those heapes which they saw; but rather that all had beene extracted out of the Myne. Wherefore they suffered themselues to be out-faced, and gaue vp the Towne as lost, which the Enemy had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not stay to settle himselfe in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too strong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haste backe into Macedon, whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, seeke matter of quarrell against Philip. The Athenians vpon slight cause, proclaime warre against Philip; mooued thereto by Attalus; whom they flatter. Philip winnes diuers Townes: and makes peremptorie answere to the Roman Ambassadour. The furious resolution of the Abydeni.

THese Asiatique matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet serued well to make a noyse in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a desire of making warre in Macedon, at least with a conceit that it were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Easterne Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greekes, which lay betweene them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greekes were factious, and seldome or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece euer since the reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betweene him and the Naturalls: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because he was originally forsooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had beene most beholding vnto him, were neuertheless weary of him, by reason of his personall faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detaine the Roman Armies: especially since the diuisions of the Countrey were such, that euery petty Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selfe; without much regarding the generality. But the poore Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were already quite exhausted, by that grieuous warre with Hannibal: wherein they had giuen by Loane to the Republique, all their money: neither had they as yet receiued, neither did they receiue vntill fifteene or sixteene yeares after this, their whole summe backe againe. That part of payment also which was already made, being not in present mony, but much of it in Land: it behoued them to rest a while, and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to bestow cost. Wherefore they tooke no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadours to solicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous enemie, that sollicited not onely the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Ilands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadours, as one that meant shortly to hold warre with the Romans vpon their owne ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong either of himselfe, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Ætolians their good friends, (and in a manner) his owne professed enemies. But such things must bee published abroad, if onely to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thriue by intermedling in the affaires of those, that were more mightie than himselfe. He was too vnskilfull, or otherwise too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would hee needes be seeking new enemies. And hee found them such, as hee deserued to haue them: for he offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in miserie, and had done him no harme. It behoued him therefore, either to haue strained his forces to the vtmost in making warre vpon them; or in desisting from that iniurious course, to haue made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But Hee, hauing broken that League of peace which is of all others the most naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnlesse they thinke themselues iustly prouoked; was afterwards too fondly perswaded, that hee might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Couenants of peace betweene him and them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby such articles of peace can bee held inviolable, saue onely * by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilest it bindes one partie, or both vnto performance, making it apparent, that he shall be a loser who starts from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long onely) bee presumed, that there shall bee no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans neuer hearkened after Philip: for necessitie made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was the Riuer of Styx dryed vp: and then could they sweare as * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their owne selues, euen by their good swords, that they had good reason to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Sopater into Africke, and the present warre against Attalus, were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

* Sir Fr. Bacon de Sap. Veterum.

* Plaut. Amphitr.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territorie, tooke state vpon them neuertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two yong Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were deliuered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous superstition, vainely said to be auaileable vnto felicitie after this life) discouered themselues by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meere errour, not thinking to haue therein done amisse; yet, as it had beene for some hainous crime, they were put to death. All their Countrymen at home tooke this in ill part; and sought to reuenge it as a publike iniurie, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to helpe them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword; and carried thence a great bootie. This indignitie stirred vp the high-minded Athenians; and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had ability to performe. All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadours to King Attalus, gratulating his happy successe against Philip, and entreating him to visit their Citie. Attalus was hereto the more willing; because he vnderstood that the Roman Embassadors, houering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to bee there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his owne followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Peraus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they reioycing that he continued enemy to Philip; and Hee being no lesse glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the warre. The Athenians came out of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wiues and children, in as solemne a pompe as they could deuise, to meete and honour the King. They entertained the

the Romanes that were with him, in very louing manner: but towards Attalus himselfe they omitted no point of obseruance, which their flatterie could suggest. At his first comming into the Citie they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfe, saying, That with an euill grace hee should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which hee studied to make them know what loue he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that hee should deliuer in writing, what hee would haue to be propounded. Hee did so. The points of his Declaration were, first, what hee had willingly done for their sake; then, what had lately passed betweene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation vnto them, to declare themselues against the Macedonian, whilest hee with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing and ready to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, He protested, that afterwards it would be vaine to craue his helpe. There needed little entreatie: for they were as willing to proclaime the warre, as Hee to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and ordained, That vnto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if He were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus beganne a great noyse of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodians taking all vpon them. But while these were vaine-ly misspending the time, in seeking to draw the Aetolians to their partie: that contrarie to their olde manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip wonne the Townes of Maronea and Aenus, with many other strong places about the Hellespont. Likewise passing ouer the Hellespont, He laid siege vnto Abydus; and wonne it, though he was faine to stay there long. The Towne held out, rather vpon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodians, then any great ability to defend it selfe against so mightie an Enemie. But the Rhodians sent thither onely one Quadrireme Gallie: and Attalus no more than three hundred men; farre to weake an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embassadours wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken so much vpon them.

These Embassadours C. Claudius, M. Aemylius, and P. Sempronius, were sent vnto Ptolemie Epiphanes King of Aegypt, to acquaint him with their victorie against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thanke him for his fauour vnto them shewed in that war; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Aegyptian King was now in the third or fourth yeere of his Reigne, which (as his Father Philopator had done before him) He beganne a very yong boy. The courtesie for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, That out of Aegypt they had lately bene supplied with Corne, in a time of extreme Dearth; when the miseries of Warre had made all their own Prouinces vnable to releeue them. This message could not but bee welcome to the Aegyptian: since it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselues against him, conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that Hee, or his Councell for him, should offer to supply the Romans with Corne: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadours both leisure and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Aemylius the yongest of them should steppe aside, and visite Philip, to try if he could make him leaue the siege of Abydus; which else He was like to carry. Aemylius, comming to Philip, tels him, that his doings are contrarie to the League that Hee had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, vpon whom He made warre, were Confederate with Rome: and the Towne of Abydus, which He was now besieging, had a kind of dependencie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made warre vpon him: and that hee did onely requite them with the like. Doe you also (sayde Aemylius) requite these poore Abydeni with such terrible Warre, for any the like Inuasion by them first made vpon you? The King was angrie to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore Hee roundly made answere to Aemylius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (aboue all,) your being a Roman, that maketh you thus presumptuous. But I would wish yee to remember the League that ye haue made with me, and to keepe it: If ye doe otherwise, I will make ye vnderstand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So Hee dismissed the Embassador; and had the Towne immediatly yeelded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to haue died euerie one of them, and set their Town on fire; binding themselues hereto by by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them vpon reasonable Conditions. But hauing in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Gouernors and Ancients of the Citie to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Siluer to Philip: about which whilest they were busie, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the yonger sort; that, by exhortation of their Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselues. Heereof the King had so little compassion, that He said, he would grant the Abydeni three dayes leisure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the Towne; or hazard themselues in interrupting the violence of those mad fooles.

The Romans decree warre against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poore the Athenians were at this time both in qualitie and estate.

THis calamitie of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romanes vnto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerely resembled; though Rome was not alike interessed in the quarrell. But to helpe themselues with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that hee should presently embarke himselfe for Italie, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in fiue moneths, but in the short space of fiue daies sayling. Thus P. Sulpitius the Consul told the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alleadged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to vndertake: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africk; to shew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Countrey. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to beleeue, that this warre with the Macedonian was both iust and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul hasted away towards Macedon, hauing that Prouince allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must bee acquainted with. Great thankes were giuen to the Athenian Embassadours, of their constancie (as was sayd) in not changing their faith at such time as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselues, that any Greeke Towne, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne parts, had reason to giue thankes vnto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an vntrue suggestion, That Philip was making readie for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romanes to giue them protection: these busie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadours into all parts of the World, euen to Ptolemy of Aegypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbors; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuertheless as it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consull were such, as might haue argued Athens to be the least part of his care. Hee sailed not about Peloponnesus, but tooke the readie way to Macedon; and landing about the Riuer of Apsus, betweene Dyrrachium and Apollonia, there beganne the Warre. Soone vpon his comming, the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craued his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilest hee was farre from them. They bemoaned themselues as men besieged, and intreated him to deliuer them.

them. For which cause he sent vnto them C. Claudius with twenty gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces hee retained with him, for the prosequution of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: onely some Rouers from Chalcis, in the Ile of Eubœa, and some bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vsed to take their shippes and spoyle their fields; because they had declared themselues against King Philip, that was Lord of these two Townes. The robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warrelike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the atriuall of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preserued them. As for the Athenians themselues, they that had beene wont, in ancient times, to vndertake the conquests of Ægypt, Cyprus, and Cicil; to make warre vpon the great Persian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subiection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest; had now no more than three ships, and those open ones, not much better than long boates. Yet thought they not themselues a whit the worse men, but stood as highly vpon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had beene still their owne.

§. X.

The Towne of Chalcis in Eubœa, taken and sackt by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprize: wasteth the Countrey about: and makes a iourny into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, and his wife. Philip offers to make warre against Nabis for the Achæans. Hee returneth home through Attica, which he spoyleth againe: and prouides against the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Diuers Princes ioyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the warre.

PHilip, returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred foorth to giue him entertainement, or perhappes before hee had well resolued, whether it were best a while to sit still, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inuaders with all his forces: he receiued aduertisement from Chalcis of a grieuous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to do somewhat that might quicken the warre, and make his owne employment better. He grew soone weary of sitting as a Scarre-crowe, to saue the Athenians grounds from spoyle; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The Towne of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemie at hand: and more negligently by the Townes men, who reposed themselues vpon their Garrison. Heereof Claudius hauing aduertisement, sayled thither by night, for feare of being descryed: and arriuing there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. Hee vsed no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it, (vnlesse he should haue left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence.) Hee set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all prouisions for Warre, which were plenteously filled. Neither were He and his Associates contented with the great abundance of spoyle which they carried about their ships, and with inlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despight and hatred vnto the King, they ouerthrew and brake in pieces the Statuaes to him there erected. This done, they hasted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit was like to be ioyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twenty miles thence; whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet hee made all haste to take reuenge. He thought to haue taken the Athenians, with their trusty friends, busie at worke in ransacking the Towne, and loading themselues with spoyle: but they were gone before his comming. Fiue thousand light-armed-foote hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leauing at Chalcis onely a few to burie the dead, Hee marched from thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not vnpossible to take his enemies, in the ioy of their Victory, as ful of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post that stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not descried him a farre off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Poſt came thither: who found all the Towne aſleepe, as feareleſſe of any danger. But the Magiſtrates, hearing his report, cauſed a trumpet out of their Cittadell to ſound the Alarme; and with all ſpeede make ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there: who ſeeing the many lights, and other ſignes of buſie preparation vſuall in ſuch a caſe, vnderſtood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repoſe themſelues till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compaſſe about by Sea, and had no cauſe of haſte) yet hauing in the Towne ſome mercenarie Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, beſides the great multitude of Citizens; they aduentured to iſſue forth at a gate, whereto they ſaw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this, reckoning all thoſe his owne, that were thus hardie. Hee therefore onely willed his men to follow his example; and preſently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight hee gaue ſingular proofe of his valour: and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great ſlaughter backe into the Citie. The heate of his courage tranſported him further, than diſcretion would haue allowed, euen to the very gate. But hee retired without harme taking; for that they which were vpon the Towers ouer the gate, could not vſe their caſting weapons againſt him, without much indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exerciſe, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments beſides, neere adioyning vnto Athens: of which hee ſpared none; but ſuffered the rage of his anger to extend, euen vnto the ſepulchers of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and ſome Companies of Attalus his men from Ægina; too late in regard of what was already paſt: but in good time to preuent him of ſatisfying his anger to the full, which as yet hee had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Achæans held a Parliament at Argos, He came thither to them vnexpected.

The Achæans were deuiſing vpon warre: which they intended to make againſt Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being ſtarted vp in the roome of Machanidas, did greater miſchiefe then any that went before him. This Tyrant relyed wholly vpon his Mercenaries; and of his ſubiects had no regard. He was a cruell oppreſſor; a greedy extortioner vpon thoſe that liued vnder him; and one that in his naturall condition ſmelt ranckly of the Hangman. In theſe qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him, ſince his dexteritie was no greater in ſpoyling the men, than hers in fleecing their wiues; whom ſhee would neuer ſuffer to bee at quiet, till they had preſented her with all their iewels and apparell. Her husband was ſo delighted with her propertie, that hee cauſed an Image to be made liuely repreſenting her; and apparelled it with ſuch coſtly garments as ſhe vſed to weare. But it was indeed an Engine, ſeruing to torment men. Heereof hee made vſe, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him ſome rich man, of whoſe mony he was deſirous; Hee would bring him into the roome where this Counterfait Apega ſtood, and there vſe all his Art of perſwaſion, to get what he deſired, as it were by good will. If he could not ſo ſpeede, but was anſwered with excuſes; then tooke hee the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apega (who ſate by in a Chaire) could perſwade more effectually. So hee ledde him to the Image, that roſe vp and opened the armes, as it were for imbracement. Thoſe armes were full of ſharpe yron nayles, the like whereof was alſo ſticking in the breaſts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith ſhee griped the poore wretch, to the pleaſure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worſe (for it were long to tell all here that is ſpoken of him) was Nabis in his Gouernment. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Ætolians, as Machanidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By theſe he grew into acquaintance with the Romanes; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former war. Of Philopœmens vertue he ſtood in feare; and therefore durſt not prouoke the Achæans, as long as they had ſuch an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a farre worſe Captaine, was their Prætor; and all, or the greateſt part of their Mercenaries were diſcharged; Philopœmen being alſo gone into Crete, to follow his beloued occupation of Warre: then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory; and waſting all the fields, made them diſtruſt their owne ſafetie in the Townes.

Againſt

Against this Tyrant the Achæans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had set downe, what proportion of Souldiers euery Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselues with the care of this businesse; forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding ioy and thankes they accepted of this kinde offer. But then he told them, That, whilest he made warre vpon Lacedæmon, He ought not to leaue his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect hee thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some Companies into the Ile of Eubœa; that so he might securely pursue the warre against Nabis. Immediately they found out his deuice; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romanes: Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis; hee brake vp the Assembly, with euery mans good liking; whereas in former times, He had beene thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieued the King to haue thus failed in his purpose with the Achæans. Neuertheless, he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Corinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had beene doing what harme hee might vnto the Countrie. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Hauen of Pyreus, and euen the City of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselues into euery of these places; that he could no more then wreake his anger vpon those goodlie Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So He destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty, of their owne; or, hauing long agoe beene masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choyce was found. Neither did he onely pull all downe: but caused his men to breake the very stones, that they might be vnseruiceable to their reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon: and there made prouision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia, and against the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infest him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Ætolians: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassage, requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped vpon the riuer of Apsus. Thence hee sent forth Apustius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Army, to waste the borders of Macedon. Apustius tooke sundry Castles and Townes; vsing such extremity of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which he wonne by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, vnlesse they knew themselues able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoyle, he was charged in Rere, vpon the passage of a brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian captaine: but the Romans had the better, and killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty, with which they arriued in safety at their campe. The successe of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet serued to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the sonne of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian: Aminander King of the Athamanians, and Bato the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their assistance vnto the Consul, who thanked them: and sayd, That hee would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon: but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Countrey lay betweene the Ætolians and Thessalie, might be perhaps auailcable with the Ætolians, to stirre them vp against Philip.

So the present care was wholly set vpon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadours from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and sayd: That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betweene his Master and the Ætolians: so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselues, without good cause, to be caried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to the defence of the Ætolians, and yet notwithstanding had beene angry, that the Ætolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busie, in obtruding their protection vpon those that needed it not? Surely it was euen the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For euen after the same sort had they lent their helpe to the Adamertines: and afterwards deliuered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuse & Messana, were subiect vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleadged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Ætolians: who if they drew such Masters into Greece, must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to consult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and send them such a Moderator, as went euery yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, That it was best for them, whilest as yet they might, and whilest one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeeres agoe made the peace which still continued; although that the very same Romanes were then against it, who sought to breake it now. It would haue troubled the Romans, to frame a good answere to these obiections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunitie, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were set on by them to speake next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few daies past, made Warre vpon the gods themselues, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Heerewithall they made a pittifull rehearsall of their owne calamities: and said, that if Philip might haue his will, Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Attica had felt; yea that Athens it selfe, together with Minerua, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to haue felt, if the walls and the Roman armes had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Armes, went roundly to the point, in hand. They sayd, that they had of late made Warre in the Ætolians behalfe, and that the Ætolians had without their consent made peace: whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselues, by alleaging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to giue them aide conuenient: so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemie, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their War and victorie, vnlesse they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceiued, that they which were so vehement, in offering their help ere it was desired, were themselues carried vnto the warre by more earnest motiues, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may haue beene the cause, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Prætor shifted them off a while with a dilatorie answer: though he told his Countrymen, That by reseruing themselues, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall termes; That ouermuch haste was an enemy to good counsaile: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But comming neerer to the matter in hand, Hee passed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude vpon this businesse; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was vnlawfull to treat of such affaires, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians inuade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Romane Fleet.

PHilip was glad to heare, that the Romanes had sped no better in their sollicitation of the Ætolians. Hee thought them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardanians;

Dardanians; hauing with him ſome of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his armie. It was iudged, as may ſeeme, that the preſence of the Kings ſonne, how yong ſoeuer, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at leaſt beleeue, that hee was not weakely attended. And this may haue beene the reaſon, why the ſame Perſeus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Ætolia by his father, whom earneſt buſineſſe called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder Heraclides, would ſerue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romanes, from doing harme by ſea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his iourney Weſtward againſt Sulpicius the Conſul.

The Armies met in the Countrey of the Deſſaretij, a people in the vtmoſt borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candauia; that running along from Hæmus in the North vntill they ioyne in the South with Pindus, incloſe the Weſterne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in ſight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Conſul was the firſt that iſſued foorth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the ſtrength which hee had then about him; and therefore thought it better to ſend foorth ſome of his light-armed Mercenaries, and ſome part of his horſe, to entertaine them with skirmiſh. Theſe were eaſily vanquiſhed by the Romanes, and driuen backe into their Campe. Now although it was ſo, that the King was vnwilling to hazard all at firſt vpon a Caſt, and therefore ſent for Perſeus with his Companies, to increaſe his owne forces: yet being no leſſe vnwilling to loſe too much in reputation; He made ſhew a day after, as if he would haue fought. He had found the aduantage of a place fit for ambuſh, wherein hee beſtowed as many as hee thought meet of his Targettiers: and ſo gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captaines to prouoke out the Romans to fight; inſtructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themſelues reſpectiuely; as opportunitie ſhould fall out. The Romans had no miſtruſt of any ambuſh, hauing fought vpon the ſame ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might haue ſuſtained ſome notable detriment, if the Kings directions had beene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him ſo hotly, that they draue him to an haſty flight, and purſued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not ſtaying to let them runne into the danger, diſcouered themſelues before it was time; and thereby made fruſtrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Conſul hereby gathered, that the King had ſome deſire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therefore preſented the ſecond time; leading forth his Armie, and ſetting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kind of helpe which the Romans had neuer vſed before, but had taken theſe of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was ſcarce aboue foureſcore yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italie, to affright the Romans, who had neuer ſeene any of thoſe beaſts before. But now the ſame Romanes (whileſt poſſibly ſome were yet aliue, which had knowne that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greekes haue none. Philip had patience to let the Conſul braue him at his Trenches: wherein he did wiſely: for the Roman had greater neede to fight, than Hee. Sulpicius was vnwilling to loſe time: neither could he without great danger, lying ſo neere the Enemie, that was ſtrong in Horſe, ſend his men to fetch in corne out of the fields. Wherefore he remoued eight myles off: preſuming that Philip would not aduenture to meete him on euen ground, and ſo the more boldly hee ſuffered his Forragers to ouer-runne the Countrey. The King was nothing ſorry of this; but permitted the Romanes to take their good pleaſure: euen till their preſumption, and his owne ſuppoſed feare, ſhould make them careleſſe. When this was come to paſſe, hee tooke all his horſe, and light-armed foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, betweene the Forragers and their Campe. There hee ſtayed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the paſſages that none ſhould eſcape. The reſt he ſent abroad the Countrey, to fall vpon the ſtraglers: willing them to put all to the ſword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The ſlaughter was great: and thoſe which eſcaped the hands of them that were ſent abroad to ſcowre the fields, lighted all or moſt of them vpon the King and his companies in their flight: ſo as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there eſcaped ſome: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went:

went: yet by telling what had happened to themselues, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon sends foorth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it needfull: He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse diuided themselues, accordingly as they met with aduertisements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were canuassing the field, tooke their taske where they found it: But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disaduantage; as comming fewer, and vnprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away: as their fellowes also might haue beene, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and giuen ouer in time. But while, not contented with such an harueſt, he was too greedie about a poore gleaning: the Romane Legions appeared in sight: which emboldened their horse too make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to look to their owne safety. They ranne which way they could: and (as men that lie in waite for others, are seldome heedfull of that which may befall themselues) to escape the Enemie, they declined the faireſt way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slaine vnder him: and there had hee beene cast away, if a louing subiect of his had not alighted, mounted him vpon his owne horse; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foote was ouertaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improuident rashnes; and the Consul, with as much dulneſſe, for his dayes seruice. A little longer stay would haue deliuered the king from these enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needes haue retired backe to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought vnlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had set vpon his Campe, at such time as hee fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken, they might haue wonne it. But that noble Historian, Liuie, (as is commonly his manner) hath iudiciously obserued, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Armie lay safe in his Campe; and could not be so astonished with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore haue abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe, he was aduertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen vpon his Countrey; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Streights. This was it which made him aduenture to doe somewhat betimes; that he might set the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleare himselfe of the Romans, as soone as he might. And to that purpose hee sent vnto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But instead of so doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Camp to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He ouertook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a wooddy ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little vse; being a square battell of pikes, not fit for euery ground. The Archers of Crete were iudged, and were indeed, more seruiceable in that case. But they were few; and their arrowes were of small force against the Roman shields. The Macedonians therfore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) layd open vnto the Consul some poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yeelded for feare. But the spoyle of these, and of the fields adioyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Armie; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselues apace out of the Countrey. The King sent Athenagoras to waite vpon them home; whileſt he himselfe went against the Ætolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætolians, who had reserued himselfe and his Nation vnto the euent of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once & againe: as also that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were fallen vpon Macedon, grew no lesse busie on the sudden, than before he had beene wise. He perswaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaime warre, ioyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made inuasion vpon Thessalie. They tooke and cruelly cruelly sacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might doe what they listed. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to haue taken their Camp; if Aminander, more warie then the Ætolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his owne mountainous Country.

About the same time; the Roman Fleete, assisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken some small Ilands in the Ægean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Isle of Eubœa; and some other places thereabout. The Townes were giuen vnto Attalus, after the same Compact that had formerly beene made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were giuen vnto the Romanes; and the people, for slaues. Other attempts on that side were hindred; either by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of meanes.

§. XII.

Villius the Roman Consul wastes a yeere to no effect. Warre of the Gaules in Italie. An Embassie of the Romans to Carthage, Masanissa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.

THus the time ranne away: and P. Villius a new Consul, tooke charge of the warre in Macedon. He was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiors: whereof two thousand; hauing serued long in Sicil and Africk, thought themselues much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had serued at Canna: as may seeme by their complaint, of hauing beene long absent from Italie; whither faine they would haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the Historie of his yeere is lost: whereof the misse is not great; since he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as wee find in Liuie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Liuie himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could find no such thing recorded in any good Authour; we may reasonably beleeue, that Villius his yeere was idle. Liu. l. 32.

In the beginning of this Macedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could haue beene expected with the Gaules. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had beene able to force; was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like sort Cremona was attempted; but saued her selfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that staied behind Asdrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gaules, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadours to the Carthaginians: giuing them to vnderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behoued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made war in Italie. Hereunto it was added (perhaps lest the message might seeme otherwise to haue sauoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitiue slaues belonging to the Romans, there were some reported to walke vp and downe in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to be restored backe to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadours that were sent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Masanissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Syphax. Vnto Masanissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure Hee might doe them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serue in their Warre against the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That hauing beene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemie, Hee ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vsed not to conferre vpon any, saue onely vpon such as had royally deserued it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadours vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answere, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite, requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corne to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Masanissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to giue them entertainement, on the borders of his Kingdome; and without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre; that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gaules: they layde siege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile: and the fruit of the victorie was such; as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwards should haue the managing of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leisure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to giue contentment vnto his subiects, by punishing a bad Counsailour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselfe the Achæans, by rendring vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a iourney (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein hee could not bee supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whose comming was expected; and hee very shortly arriued at the Armie.

§. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. Quintius winnes a passage against Philip. Thessalie wasted by Philip, the Romans, and Ætolians. The Achæans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. Philip deliuers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THe Romanes had not beene wont in former times, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their vse, to giue battaile to the Enemie, as soone as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disaduantage in reputation, when he had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weakenesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the subtle Greekes, the arte of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a little while they proued. Their Treasury was poore, and stood indebted, *many yeeres after this, vnto priuat men, for part of those monies that had beene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonaltie auerse from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driuen the Senators greedy of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might haue the lesse neede to relie vpon their Confederats. So they leuied eight thousand foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting foorth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselues to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident vnto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home) haue bred some iealousie in their friends of Greece, and and thereby haue lost some friends, yea, perhaps haue increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadours; requesting that either they would vndertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who inuaded it; or else that they would not take it vncourteouslie, that hee quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answere was remarquable. They saide, That it was not their manner to vse the ayde of their friends, longer than their friendes had good opportunitie, and could also bee well contented to affoorde it;

That

That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadours, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an attonement betweene them. In such louing fashion did they now carry themselues, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded these termes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius hasting away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the supply decreed vnto him, which consisted, for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had serued in Spaine and Africke. He found Villius the old Consul, (whom at his comming hee presently discharged) and king Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the riuer of Apsus or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Dassaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two yeeres together miss-spent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of victualls: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountains, which diuided the South of Epirus from Thessalie, then should they enter into a plentifull Country, and which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a maner) part of his kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuertheless, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelyhood. For the riuer of Apsus, running along through that valley which alone was open betweene the Mountaines, made it all a deep Marish and vnpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rocke by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assayled to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappoynted of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemy, who neglected not the gard of them that was very easie; hee was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of forty dayes.

This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the war might be ended by composition, vpon some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom hee had many friends) that Hee and the Consul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consul would haue him to set all Townes of Greece at libertie, and to make amends for the iniuries, which hee had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to giue libertie to those whom hee had subdued of late: but vnto such, as had beene long subiect vnto him and his Ancestors, Hee thought it against all reason, that hee should relinquish his claime and dominion ouer them. He also said, That as farre foorth as it should appeare that hee had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatsoeuer, Hee could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme conuenient in the iudgement of some free State, that had not beene interessed in those quarrels. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no iudgement or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwaies beene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one prouoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Consul was required to name those Townes, that he would haue to be set at libertie; the first that he named were the Thessalians: These had beene Subiects (though conditionall) vnto the Macedonian Kings, euer since the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Thessalians; the King in a rage demanded what sharper Condition He would haue layd vpon him, had he beene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly hee flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this the Consul stroue in vaine two or three dayes together, to haue preuayled against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselfe, and could not resolue what course to take: there came to him an Heards-man, sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romanes, who hauing long kept beasts in those Mountaines, was throughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore vndertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should haue aduantage of the Enemy. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound:

bound: and being promised a great reward, in case hee made good his word, had such Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They trauailed by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for feare of being discouered. When they had recouered the hill-tops, and were aboue the Macedonians, (though vndiscouerd by them, because at their backs) they raised a great smoke, whereby they gaue notice of their successe vnto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilest these were on their iourny, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian, thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were sent, he pressed as neare as he could vnto the Enemies Campe, and assailed them in their strength. He preuailed as little as in former times, vntill the shoutings of those that ranne downe the hill, and charged Philip on the backe, astonished so the Macedonians, that they betooke themselues to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to saue himselfe. Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needes hinder the Romans from pursuing him: hee made a stand at the end of fiue miles, and gathered there together his broken troops, of whom he found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and prouisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians beganne to stand in feare, lest being driuen from a place of such aduantage, they should hardly make good their party against the Enemy, vpon equall ground. Neither was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore he caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his hasty retrait he could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countrie, carying away with them as much as they were able, and spoyling all the rest. But all of them could not be perswaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their king) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him, which they might the better doe, for that he could not stay to vse any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it very grieuously, that he was driuen to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitfull Countrey, which had euer been well affected vnto him: so that a little hinderance did serue, to make him breake off his purpose, and withdraw himselfe home into his kingdome of Macedon.

The Ætolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were euen in a readinesse to inuade Thessalie; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their seuerall Countries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they foreslowed not the occasion, but made all speede, each of them to lay holde vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their haruest, could not find enough to maintaine his Army. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose liberty the Romans a few dayes since had made shew to be very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselues, or whom to auoyde. T. Quintius wonne Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Pteria yeelded vnto him. Rhage he besieged: and hauing made a faire breach, yet was vnable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, hauing somewhat recollected his spirits, houered about Tempe with his Army, thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, hauing wel-neare spent his victualls, and seeing no hope to preuaile at Rhage; brake vp his siege, and departed out of Thessaly. He had appointed his ships of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Hauen Towne of Phocis, on the Gulph of Corinth: which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he presently inuaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conueniently seated between Thessaly and other regions, wherein he had businesse, or was shortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phocis he wonne by assault: many were yeelded vp vnto him for feare; and within short space hee had (in effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, ioyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleete. They wonne two Cities in Eubœa; and afterward layd siege vnto Cenchree, an Hauen and Arcenall of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprise did somewhat helpe forward the Achæans, in their desire to leaue the part of Philip: since it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent, and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendred vnto their Nation, by fauour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Achæans to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had bene long accustomed. For this King had so many wayes offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilest being intangled in a dangerous warre, hee wanted meanes to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practises to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poysoning of Aratus their old Gouernour: His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed, had caused them long since to holde him as a necessary euill, euen whilest they were vnable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopœmen, they were growne somewhat confident in their owne strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as hauing him to friend: then did they only thinke how euill he was; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that hee was become no longer necessary. It angred him to perceiue how they stood affected: and therefore hee sent murderers, to take away the life of* Philopœmen. But failing in this enterprise, and being detected, he did thereby onely set fire to the Wood, which was throughly dry before, and prepared to burne. Philopœmen wrought so with the Achæans, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to with draw themselues from the Macedonian. Cycliadas, a principall man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristænus chosen Prætor, who laboured to ioyne them in societie with the Romans.

* Plut. in vita Philopœm. Iust. l. 29.

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romanes, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Achæans; making promise, that they should haue Corinth restored vnto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achæans was held at Sicyon, to deliberate and resolue in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Achæans, to ioyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrarywise, the Embassadors of Philip, whom he had also sent for this businesse, admonishing the Achæans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadour, did no way aduance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Achæans to vnderstand, That hee, who could bee satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe vnable to gratifie them in any reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councel; who remembring the benefites of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preseruation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sence of late iniuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; preuailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which he, (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baites, whereby to allure them into absolute subiection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romanes were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much altercation the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this warre. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they foorthwith entred into societie: with the Romanes (because no League would bee of force, vntill the Senate and people had approued it) they forbore to decree any society at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadours from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argiues, hauing dont their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not resist, nor yet with honestie thereto giue assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argiues had so little thanke, that all the rest of the Achæans may bee the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a solemne day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discouered it selfe so plainely, in the behalfe of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might haue any small assistance. Philocles, a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither comming on a ſudden, and finding the Multitude readie to ioyne with him, He eaſily compelled the Achæan Garriſon to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and ſome other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, ſo they gaue him hope to obtaine ſome good end by Treatie, whileſt as yet with his honour he might ſeeke it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Conſul would ſhortly be choſen; who ſhould take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the ſooner. Titus had the like reſpect vnto himſelfe; and therefore thought it beſt, ſince more could not bee done, to prædiſpoſe things vnto a Concluſion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-ſhore, in the Bay then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is ſuppoſed) the Gulfe of Ziton, in the Ægæan Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamanian; an Embaſſador of Attalus, the Admirall of Rhodes; and ſome Agents for the Ætolians and Achæans. Philip had with him ſome few of his owne Captaines, and Cycliadas, lately baniſhed for his ſake out of Achaia. He refuſed to come on ſhore: though fearing (as he ſaid) none but the immortall Gods: yet miſdoubting ſome treachery in the Ætolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romanes were, That he ſhould ſet all Cities of Greece at libertie; deliuer vp to the Romans and their Confederates, all priſoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewiſe whatſoeuer he held of theirs in Illiria; and whatſoeuer about Greece or Aſia he had gotten from Ptolemie then King of Ægypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded reſtitution to be made, entire, of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and ſpoyled in the late warre betweene them. The Rhodians would haue againe the Countrie of Perea, lying ouer againſt their Iland; as alſo that he ſhould withdraw his Garriſons, out of diuers Townes about the Helleſpont, and other Hauens of their friends. The Achæans deſired reſtitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniuſtly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their conſent. The Ætolians tooke vpon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrie, leauing it free; and withall to deliuer vp vnto them, whatſoeuer he held that had at any time beene theirs. Neither were they here withall content: but inſolently declaymed againſt him, for that which hee had lately done in Theſſalie; corrupting (as they ſaid) the rewards of the Victors, by deſtroying, when hee was vanquiſhed, thoſe Townes which elſe they might haue gotten. To anſwere theſe malapert Ætolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to be row neerer the ſhore. But they beganne to plie him afreſh: telling him, that he muſt obey his betters, vnleſſe hee were able to defend himſelfe by force of Armes. He anſwered them, (as he was much giuen to gybing) with ſundry ſcoffes; and eſpecially with one, which made the Romane Conſul vnderſtand, what manner of companions theſe Ætolians were. For hee ſaid, That he had often dealt with them; as likewiſe the beſt of the Greekes; deſiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take ſpoile from ſpoyle: yet could he get no better an anſwer, than that they would ſooner take Ætolia out of Ætolia. Titus wondred what might be the meaning of this ſtrange Law. So the King tlod him, That they held it a laudable cuſtome, as often as Warre happened betweene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by ſending voluntaries to ſerue on both ſides, that ſhould ſpoyle both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, Hee ſaid it was ſtrange that the Ætolians ſhould bee ſo carefull thereof, ſince diuers Tribes of their owne, which hee there named, were indeede no Grecians: wherefore hee would faine know, whether the Romanes would giue him leaue to make ſlaues of thoſe Ætolians, which were no Greekes. Titus hereat ſmiled, and was no whit offended, to heare the Ætolians well ratled vp; touching whom hee began to vnderſtand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that generall demand of ſetting all Greece at libertie, Philip acknowledged, that it might well beſeeme the greatneſſe of the Romans; though hee would alſo conſider, what might beſeeme his owne dignitie. But that the Ætolians, Rhodians and other pettie Eſtates, ſhould thus preſume, vnder countenance of the Romanes, to take vpon them, as if by their great might hee ſhould bee thereunto compelled: it was, hee ſaide, a ſtrange and ridiculous inſolence. The Achæans hee charged with much ingratitude; reciting againſt them ſome Decrees of their owne; wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honors. Neuertheles he ſaid, that he would render Argos vnto them: but, as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberat with Titus himſelfe.

Thus

Thus he addressed himselfe wholly to the Roman Generall; vnto whom if he could giue satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late warre, (hee said) was onely defensiue; they having been the offerers: or if he gaue them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his sonne in law; neither did he see why they should rather seeke a breach at his hands, than hee at theirs. For whereas they complayned, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, he had cut downe the Groue, and pleasant walkes thereabouts: what could hee doe more, than send Gardiners thither with yong plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence? Thus he iested the matter out: but offered neuerthelesse, in honour of the Romans, to giue backe the Region of Perea to the Rhodians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof hee had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leisure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many, and hee ill prouided of Counsaile, wherewith to aduise about them. For your being so ill prouided of Counsaile, said Titus, you may euen thanke your selfe; as hauing murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the waightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolue. But it was beleeued, that he thereby sought too abbridge the Aetolians of leisure to raile at him. And this was the more likely, for that he desired conference in priuate with the Roman Generall. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That hee would giue the Achaans both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Aetolians, that hee would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoeuer they did challenge. This when Titus his associats heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which he now rendred vp. The noise that they made came to Philips eare: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, he would suffer himselfe to bee perswaded by them. So the third day they mette early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with sincere affection hearken vnto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendred; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadours to Rome, where he would refer re himselfe to the courtesie of the Senate.

This was euen as Quintius would haue it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Consul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the warre. So he easily preuailed with the rest, to assent hereunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time vnfit for seruice in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolutely either in Warre or peace. Further hee willed them to send their seuerall Embassadours to Rome, which intimating vnto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtaining any thing to their preiudice. Among the rest he perswaded King Amintander, to make a iourney to Rome in person; knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadours, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citie. All this tended to procure, that his owne Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet hee knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons which they alleaged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadour of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victorie, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in vndertaking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they said) could neuer bee effected; vnlesse especiall care were taken, that the King should bee dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrie, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in seruilitie; that the Senate agreed to haue it euē so as they desired. When therefore the Embassadours of Philip were brought in, and beganne to haue made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the middest of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Master would yeeld vp Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: Hereto they made answer, That cōcerning those places, the King had giuen them no direction or Commission what to say, or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadours haue truely said, That neither the Aetolians, Achæans, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any claime to either of these Townes? As for Corinth, whereto the Achæans had some right, (though their right were no better, than that, hauing stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargaine vnto an Other.) Philip had already condescended to giue it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would haue beene alleadged, euen against the Greekes, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so he might haue had the honour to conclude the warre, if a Successour had beene decreed vnto him. But since he was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadours into Greece, cared to giue eare vnto any talke of peace.

Philip, seeing that his Achæans had forsaken him, and ioyned with their common Enemies; thought euen to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himselfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeeres past, since the Lacedæmonians vnder Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had beene almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Achæans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though stiling himselfe King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achæans: and therefore seemed to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be wonne. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be consigned ouer into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serue to tie him fast vnto the Macedonian. Philocles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appoynted to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a streight alliance with the Lacedæmonian, by giuing some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnlesse by decree of the Citizens themselues he might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argiues: but found them so auerse; that, in open assembly of the people, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to robbe and fleece them. So hee willed Philocles, without more adoe, to make ouer the Towne which hee was ready to receiue. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argiues: who for very loue had forsaken the Achæans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderstanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that staied behinde, were commanded to bring foorth, out of hand, all their Gold and Siluer. Also a great imposition of monie was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more adoe. But if any stood long vpon the matter: or played the theeues, in purloyning their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and, besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely such, as might serue to make him gracious with the rascall multitude: abrogating all debts, and diuiding the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath beene an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselues of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, He sent the newes to T. Quintius; and offered to ioyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the paines to crosse ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meete with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cauill touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romane fixe hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also hee agreed with the Achæans, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, reseruing the finall conclusion of peace betweene them vntill the Warre of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

§. XIIII.

The battaile at Cynoſcephalæ, wherein Philip was vanquiſhed by T. Quintius.

TITUS Quintius, as ſoone as hee vnderſtood that he was appointed to haue Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleaſure of the Senate; made all things readie for diligent purſuite of the Warre. The like did Philip: who hauing failed in his negotiation of peace, and no leſſe failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre; meant afterwards wholy to relie vpon himſelfe.

Titus had in his Armie about ſixe and twentie thouſand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others ſtrength, or what his Enemie intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Theſſalie, and thereupon addreſſed himſelfe to ſeeke him out. They had like to haue met vnawares, neere vnto the Citie of Phera: where the vant-courriers on both ſides diſcouered each other; and ſent word thereof vnto their ſeuerall Captaines. But neither of them were ouer haſtie, to commit all to hazard vpon ſo ſhort warning. The day following each of them ſent out three hundred Horſe, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better diſcouerie. Theſe met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their ſeuerall Campes, with little aduantage vnto either ſide. The Country about Phera was thicke ſet with Trees: and otherwiſe full of Gardens and mud-walles; which made it vnproper for ſeruice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King diſlodged, intending to remoue backe into Scotuſa in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully ſerued with all neceſſaries. Titus conceiued aright his meaning: and therefore purpoſed alſo to march thitherwards; were it onely to waſte the Country. There lay betweene them a great ledge of hils, which hindered the one from knowing what courſe the other tooke. Neuertheleſſe they encamped not farre aſunder, both the firſt and the ſecond night; though neither of them vnderſtood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempeſtuous; and forced each of them to take vp his lodging, where hee found it, by chance. Then ſent they foorth diſcouerers againe, in greater number than before. Theſe meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at firſt the Macedonians had the worſe. But Philip anon ſent in ſuch ſtrong ſupply; that if the reſiſtance of the Ætolians had not beene deſperate, the Romans their fellowes had beene driuen backe into their Campe. Yet, all reſiſtance notwithſtanding, the Macedonians preuailed: ſo that Titus himſelfe was faine to bring foorth his Legions, that were not a little diſcouraged, by the defeat of all their Horſe, to animate thoſe which were in flight. Plut. in vita T. Q. Flam.

It was altogether beſides the Kings purpoſe, to put the fortune of a battaile in truſt that day, with ſo much of his Eſtate as might thereon depend. But the newes came to him thicke and tumultuouſly, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his owne; if hee could vſe an occaſion, the like whereof hee ſhould not often finde. This cauſed him to alter his purpoſe: inſomuch as he embattailed his men; and climbed vp thoſe hils, which, for that the knops thereon had ſome reſemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word ſignifying as much, Cynoſcephalæ. As ſoone as he was on the hil-top; it did him good to ſee that they of his owne light armature were buſie in fight, almoſt at the very Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled ſo farre. Hee had alſo libertie to chooſe his ground, as might ſerue beſt his aduantage: foraſmuch as the Romanes were quite driuen from all parts of the Hill. But of this commoditie he could make no great vſe: the roughneſſe of the place among thoſe Dogs heads, as they were called, ſeruing nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Neuertheleſſe hee found conuenient roome, wherein to marſhall the one part of his Armie: and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with the reſt; embattailing them as they might. Whileſt he was doing this: Hee perceiued that his Horſemen and light armature beganne to ſhrinke; as being falne vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driuen to recoyle. He ſets forward to helpe them: and they no leſſe haſtily draw vnto him for ſuccour; hauing the Romans not farre behinde them.

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded thoſe of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Here Titus found an extreme difficult piece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great square battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now vsed in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner vsed, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it selfe held together vndissolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points aduanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if the Romans gaue backe: euery one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come neerer to the next of them, than the length of a doozen foot or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it; was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while hee obserued, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much vneuennes of the ground, to put themselues in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hil-tops; or else (which was worse) vpon desire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the worke, ranne foolishly along by the side of their fellowes, which were occupyed in fight.

Of this their disorder Hee made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaile to march vp the hill, against these ill ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readyer to dispute what should bee done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as hauing no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeede if they should haue done their best, it could not haue serued; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons vnusefull. For let it be supposed, that Philip hauing sixe and twentie thousand in his Armie (as hee is said to haue beene equall to the Enemie in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and foure thousand light-armed: so shall there remaine fourteene thousand Pikes; whereof he himselfe had embattailed the one halfe in a Phalanx, the other halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is readie now to charge. The Phalanx hauing vsually sixteene in File, must, when it consisted of seuen thousand, haue welneere foure hundred and fortie in ranke: but foure hundred would serue, to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or seuen and thirtie Files might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore as Polybius doth, to euery man of them three foote of ground: this Front must haue occupied twelue hundred Foote, or two hundred and fortie paces; that is, very neere a quarter of a myle in length. Such a space of open Champaine, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillockes, or the like impediments, that must of necessitie disioyne this close battayle of the Phalanx; was not euery where to bee found. Here at Cynoscephalæ Philip had so much roome, as would only suffice for the one halfe of his men; the rest were faine to stand still and looke about them, being hindered from putting themselues in order, by the roughnesse of the Dogges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from comming vp vnto them; nor found any difficulty in mastring those enemies, whose feet were in a manner bound by the discommodity of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to giue backe; and the comming on of the Legions, to betake themselues to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell, seeing the victory on that part assured, left the prosequution of it vnto others: and being followed by twenty Ensignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable piece of worke; and mainely helpfull to making of the victorie compleate. He considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on so farre: as that himselfe with his fellowes, in mounting the hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten aboue the Kings head. Wherefore he turned to the left hand: and making downe the hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hindemost rankes of the Phalanx, all of them indeede saue the first fiue, were accustomed, when the battells came to ioyning, to carry their pikes vpright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their fore-men: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconuenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it serued neyther for offence nor defence, except onely in front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when hee was to fight with Darius in Mesopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the foure sides of it were as so many fronts looking sundrie wayes, wayes, because he expected that he should be encompassed round: yet is it to be vnderstood, that herein he altered the vsuall forme; as also at the same time hee embattailed his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turne their weapons, which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, That Alexanders men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keepe their owne ground; not being able to follow vpon the Enemie, vnlesse their hindmost rankes could haue marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such prouision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise vnable to helpe themselues, threw downe their weapons, and fled. The King himselfe had thought vntill now, that the fortune of the battaile was euery where alike, and the day his owne. But hearing the noyse behinde him, and turning a little aside with a troupe of Horse, to see how all went: when hee beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romanes at his backe on the higher ground; He presently betook himselfe to flight. Neither staid he afterwards in any place (except only a small while about Tempe, there to collect such as were dispersed in this ouerthrow) vntill he was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battaile, about seuen hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and fiue thousand taken prisoners.

§. XIV.

T. Quintius falleth out with the Ætolians; and grants truce vnto Philip, with conditions, vpon which the peace is ratified. Libertie proclaimed vnto the Greekes. The Romans quarrell with Antiochus.

HE Ætolians wonderfully vanted themselues; and desired to haue it noysed through all Greece, that the victory at Cynoscephala was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeede the most of the bootie; by sacking the Macedonian Campe, whilest the Romans were busied in the chace. Titus therefore being offended both at their vaine-glory, and at their rauenous condition; purposed to teach them better manners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselues. He also well perceiued, That by vsing them with any extraordinary fauour, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Ætolians much more vehemently, than euer they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battaile Titus made haste vnto Larissa, a Citie of Thessalie: which he presently tooke. Before his comming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages whatsoeuer in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduersitie, he forgot not to prouide for the safety of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceiue, that he gaue them as alreadie lost. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their Neighbors, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Towne of Leucas bordering vpon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleete: and verie soone after, all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Ætolians euer true to Philip; gaue vp themselues vnto the Romans, hearing of the victorie at Cynoscephala. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Pæa, a Region of the Continent ouer against the Iland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treaty of Peace. They did heerein more manly, then any other of the Greekes: forasmuch as they awaited not the good leisure of the Romanes; but with an Army of their own, & some helpe which they borrowed of the Achæans and other their friends, gaue battell to Dinocrates the Kings Lieutenant, wherein they had the victory, & consequently recouered the whole Prouince. It angred Philip worse then all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to inuade his Kingdome; wasting and spoyling, as if all had beene abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie in all haste of sixe thousand foot and fiue hundred horse: wherewith comming vpon them, he draue them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdome. Which done, He returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise He had successe answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, hee thought it wisedome to yeeld vnto necessity; and therefore sent in all haste Limnæus and Demosthenes, with with Cycliadas the banished Athenian, in whom he repoſed much confidence, Embaſſadors vnto Titus. Theſe had conference a long while in priuate with Titus and ſome of his Romane Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wiſe diſmiſſed. It ſeemes that they had Commiſſion, to referre all vnto Titus his owne diſcretion; as Philip himſelfe in few daies after did. There was granted vnto him a Truce for fifteene daies: in which time, the King himſelfe might come and ſpeake with the Romain Generall. In the meane ſeaſon many ſuſpitious rumors went of Titus, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greekes his Confederates. Of theſe bruits the Ætolians were chiefe authors: who being wont to regard neither friendſhip nor honeſtie, where profit led them a wrong way, iudged alike of all men elſe. But againſt the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had ſent letters vnto his Aſſociates; willing them to haue their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treaty ſhould bee held. There when they were all aſſembled, they entred into conſultation before the Kings arriuall, what ſhould be moſt expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for euery eſtate in particular. The poore King Aminander beſought them all, & eſpecially the Romans, that they would thinke vpon him; and conſidering his weakeneſſe which he confeſſed, make ſuch prouiſion, that after the Romans had turned their backes, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to reſiſt. Then ſpake Alexander one of the Ætolians: who commending Titus forſomuch as he had thus aſſembled the Confederates to aduiſe vpon their owne good, and had willed them to deliuer their mindes freelie: added, That in the maine of the purpoſe which he had in hand, he was vtterly deceiued: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither aſſure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greekes of their liberty. There was, he ſaid, none other end to be made of the warre, which could agree either with the purpoſe of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the faire promiſes made by Titus himſelfe vnto the Greekes, than the chaſing of Philip quite out of his Kingdome. And to this effect he made a long diſcourſe. But Titus anſwered, That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleaſure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable cuſtomes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to ſeeke the vtter deſtruction of any King or Nation, at ſuch time as they firſt made warre with them; vntill by ſome rebellion they found it a matter of neceſſitie, to take ſuch a rigorous courſe. And heereof hee alleadged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victorie, to generous mindes, was onely an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publike benefit of Greece: it was (he ſaid) expedient, that the Kingdome of Macedon ſhould be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it ſhould be vtterly deſtroyed: foraſmuch as it ſerued as a barre, to the Thracians, Gaules, and a multitude of other ſauage Nations, which would ſoone ouer-flow the whole Continent of Greece, if this kingdom were not interpoſed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto thoſe demands, wherewith hee had preſſed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reaſon to denie him peace. As for the Ætolians: if they thought otherwiſe, it ſhould be at their owne pleaſure, to take counſaile apart for themſelues as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, another of the Ætolians, to ſay, That all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greekes, no leſſe than hee had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leaue his babling; ſaying, That himſelfe would take ſuch order, as that Philip, were he neuer ſo deſirous, ſhould thenceforth not haue it in his power to moleſt the Greekes.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus vſed friendly: and ſuffering him to repoſe himſelfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yeelded vnto all that had been required at his hands; offering yet further to ſtand to the good pleaſure of the Senate, if they would haue more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Ætolian, inſulting ouer him, ſaid it was to bee hoped, that hee would then at length giue vp to the Ætolians a many of townes (which he there named) bidding him ſpeak whether he would, or no. His anſwer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interpoſing himſelfe, ſaid it ſhould be otherwiſe; Theſe were Theſſalian Townes, and ſhould be all free: one of them onely excepted, which not long agoe had refuſed to commit it ſelfe to the faith of the Romans, and therfore ſhould now be giuen to the Ætolians. Heereat Phaneas cried out, that it was too great an iniurie, thus to bee defrauded of the Townes that had sometime belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather hee willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Couenant betweene them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to haue nothing saue the pillage and captiues. It is true, that there had beene such a Condition in the former warre; but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soone as the Aetolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gaue them to vnderstand, asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the Townes in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be deliuered into subiection of the Aetolians. The rest of the Confederates were very much delighted, with these angry passages betweene the Romans and the Aetolians: neither had they great reason to feare any hard measure, since Titus was so earnest in behalfe of those Thessalians, to giue them libertie, though they had stood out against him. Euen till very feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselues; but gaue their consent willingly vnto a Truce for foure Moneths.

Townes

The chiefe cause that moued Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, besides that laudable custome by him before alleadged; was, the fame of Antiochus his comming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing neere toward Europe. Hee had also perhaps yet a greater motiue; euen the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right: For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Consuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace; alleadging friuolous matter of their owne suspirion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, betweene the Embassadours of Philip, offering to stand to whatsoeuer was demanded, and the letters of Titus pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side; and the importunitie of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as soone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assembly of the People, by whose soueraigne authority it was concluded, That Peace should be granted vnto the King. So tenne Embassadors were sent from Rome ouer into Greece: in which number were they, that had beene Consuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, That Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would very faine haue retained those three important Cities, of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better setled. But finally Titus preuailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred vnto the Achaans; and all the other Greeke Townes which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored vnto libertie.

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next * Isthmian Games, Hee should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the Greeke Townes which he held, and consigne them ouer to the Romans: That he should deliuer vp vnto them all Captiues that hee had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his shippes of warre, reseruing to himselfe onely fiue of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinarie greatnesse, wherein sixteene men laboured at euery oare: Further, that he would pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres following, by euen portions. Hereto * Liuie addes, That he was forbidden to make warre out of Macedon, without permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he obserued this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred talents he had already deliuered to Titus, together with his yonger son Demetrius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, as such time as he lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the money, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as yong Demetrius, who together with those four hundred Talents was giuen for hostage, remained still in custodie of the Romans, as a part of the bargaine which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusias King of Bythinia: giuing him to vnderstand what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greekes; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Cians, most miserably spoyled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bithynian his sonne-in-law, should be restored to libertie, and permitted to enioy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these letters wrought, it was not greatly materiall; since the Romans were shortly buried with Antiochus, in such wise that they had no leisure to examine the conformity of Prusias to their will.

All Greece reioyced at the good bargaine which Titus had made with Philip. Onely the Ætolians found themselues agreeued that they were vtterly neglected; which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Bœotians continued to fauour the Macedonian, and thereby occasioned vnto themselues much trouble. There were some among them well-affected to the Romanes: who seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus, saying, that they were no better then lost, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnlesse at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction might be made away. Titus refused to haue a hand in the execution, yet nevertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to haue kept themselues vndiscouered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those which were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans, in such wise, that howsoeuer they durst not take Armes against them, yet such of them as they found straggling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrie. This was detected within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Bœotians, to haue the murderers deliuered into his hands, and for fiue hundred souldiers, which he had lost by them, to haue paid vnto him fiue hundred Talents. Instead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which hee would not take as good satisfaction. Hee sends Embassadours to the Achæans and Athenians, informing them what had hapned: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserued. Herewithall he falls to wasting their Country, and besiegeth two such Townes of theirs, as did seeme to bee most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Achæans and Athenians, (especially of the Achæans who offered, if he needed them, to helpe him in this warre; yet besought him rather to grant peace vnto the Bœotians) preuailed so farre with him; that he was pacified with thirty Talents, and the punishment of such as were knowne offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them reioycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting that the Roman would proue a worse neighbour. The Ætolian would haue beene glad of any Commotion, and therefore published rumors abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceiue, that this Macedonian Warre serued as an introduction to the Warre to bee made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to bee reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumours, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were neuer without great solemnity and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flamminius the Generall, hauing vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and liuing at their owne Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Achæans of Phthiotis, Magnetians, Thessalians, and Perrhæbians. The suddennesse of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durst scarce credit their owne eares. The Greekes were Crafts-masters in the Art of giuing thankes; which they rendred now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-neere smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greekes, was like to be much more auaileable vnto the Romanes in their warre against Antiochus, than could haue beene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Prouinces which were named in the Proclamation. Vpon confidence hereof, no sooner were the Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romanes that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hegesianax and Lysias King Antiochus his Embassadours: whom they willed to signifie vnto their Lord, That hee should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vexe them with warre: as also to restore whatsoeuer he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomie or Philip. Moreouer they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe ouer his Army into adding, That ſome of them would viſit him in perſon ere it were long, to talke with him further concerning theſe points. This done, they fell to accompliſhing their promiſes vnto the Greeks; to the reſt they gaue what they had promiſed. But the Phocians and Locrians they gaue vnto the Ætolians; whom they thought it no wiſedome to offend ouermuch, being ſhortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Achæans of Phthiotis they annexed vnto the Theſſalians; all ſaue the Towne of Thebes in Phthiotis, the ſame which had beene abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the laſt Treaty with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earneſtly about Pharſalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory anſwere, and reiected vnto the Senate: for howſoeuer ſomewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they ſhould haue their will, as it were in deſpight of Titus. So the Achæans were reſtored Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeed (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achæan Common-wealth, enioyed their liberty in as abſolute manner, as they could deſire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were giuen one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and vpon Aminander were beſtowed thoſe Caſtles, which he had gotten from Philip during this Warre; to reigne in them and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had beene their owne Caruers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victorie; and therefore loſt his ſhare. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would haue giuen the Townes of Oreum and Erctria, in the Ile of Eubœa, to his ſonne and ſucceſſour King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that theſe as well as the reſt of the Eubœans, ſhould be ſuffered to enioy their libertie. Oreſtis, a little Prouince of the Kingdome of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yeelded vnto the Romanes long ere this, and ſince continued true to them: for which cauſe it was alſo ſet at libertie, and made a free eſtate by it ſelfe.

Theſe buſineſſes being diſpatcht: it remained, that all care ſhould be vſed, not how to auoid the warre with King Antiochus, but how to accompliſh it with moſt eaſe and proſperity. Wherefore Embaſſadours were ſent both to Antiochus himſelfe, to picke matter of quarrell; and about vnto others, to prædiſpoſe them vnto the aſſiſting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre againſt this King the Romans now had, or ſhortly after found: as alſo how their Embaſſadours and Agents dealt and ſped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

CHAP. V.

The Warres of the Romans with ANTIOCHVS the Great, and his adherents.

§. I.

What Kings, of the races of Seleucus and Ptolomie, reigned in Aſia and Ægipt before Antiochus the great.

Seleucus Nicator, the firſt of his race, King of Aſia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twentie and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherouſly ſlaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; hauing (as is ſaide) beene warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatall place of his death. But I neuer haue read that any mans life hath beene preſerued, or any miſchance auoyded, by the predictions of ſuch Diuelliſh Oracles. Rather I beleeue, That many ſuch predictions of the Heathen Gods, haue beene ante-dated by their Prieſts or by others; which deuiſed them after the euent. Polyb. lib. 31.

Antiochus Soter, the ſonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearely beloued of his Father: who ſurrendred vp vnto him his owne wife Stratonica, when hee vnderſtood how much the yong Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolomy Ceraunus had great cauſe to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not be vnreuenged by this his Succeſſor.

But

But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps only with faire words; containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Ceraunus enioy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the bloud of Seleucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queene Stratonica in his Fathers life; yet out of modestie he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous loue was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that reuenge; whereunto Nature should haue vrged him. Afterwards hee had warres with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Also Lutarius and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gaules, were set vpon him by the same Nicomedes. With these hee fought a great battaile: wherein though otherwise the Enemies had all aduantage against him; yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he wonne the Victorie. He tooke in hand an enterprise against Ptolomie Philadelphus: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he soon gaue it ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldean dedicated his Historie of Assyria; the same, which hath since been excellently falsified by the Frier Annius. Hee left behinde him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married vnto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentie and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeere of the Kingdome of the Greekes, when he had reigned ninteene yeeres.

Genebrard l. 2. Iust. Mart. in Paran.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, had this vaine and impious title giuen to him, by flatterie of the Milesians; whom he deliuered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. Hee held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolomie Philadelphus King of Ægypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolomie.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierome and other Interpreters haue vnderstood that Prophecy of Daniel: The Kings daughter of the South, shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Dan. 11. 6.

Ptolomie Philadelphus was a great louer of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne sister Arsinoe) a very excellent Prince: howsoeuer, the worthiest of all that race. It was Hee, that built and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria: which to adorne, and to honour the more, Hee sent vnto Eleazar then high Priest of the Iewes, for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Iewes, had formerly beene very great: for He had set at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in slauerie throughout all Ægypt; and he had sent vnto the * Temple of God in Hierusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar yeelding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptolomie caused to be translated into Greek, by seuenty two of the most graue and learned persons that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72. Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seuentie; Iesus the sonne of Syrach, is thought by Genebrard to haue beene one: who that he liued in this Age, it seemes to me very sufficiently proued by Ianssenius, in his Preface vnto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this businesse between Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as [h] Iosephus affirmes) by Aristæus that was employed therein. Fortie yeeres Ptolemie Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein he ioyntly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly beloued of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had beene in his former yeeres: in which time he boasted, that he alone had found out the way how to liue for euer. If this had bin referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might haue stood with reason: otherwise, the Gowt, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his owne errour. Hee was the first of the Kings, deriued from Alexanders Successors, that entred into League with the Romans: as also of his Off-spring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp.

Concerning that Booke which now goes vnder the name of Aristæus; many learned men, & among the rest Lodouicus Viues, hold suspition that it is counterfeit, and the inuention of some late Author. Surely if it were to be suspected in the time of Viues; it may be now much more iustly suspected: since a new Edition of it is come foorth, purged from faults (as the Papists terme those bookes wherein they haue changed what they please) and set forth by Middendorpius at Colen. An. Dom. 1578.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolemie. After his second marriage, hee vsed his first wife with no better regard, than if she had beene his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet aduentured not to seeke reuenge; vntill her own sonne Seleucus Callinicus was of ability to be King. This was two or three yeeres after the death of Ptolomie Philadelphus: at what time she poysoned her husband Theos; and by permission of Seleucus her son, murdered

Berenice,

Berenice, together with a sonne that she had borne to Antiochus. Iustine reports, that Berenice saued her selfe, together with the yong Prince her childe, a while in the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that not onely sortie Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolemie Euergetes, King of Ægypt, came to relieue her with an Armie; though too late, for she was slaine before. Iust. L. 27.

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeeding vnto his Father that had fifteene yeeres beene King, beganne his reigne. His subiects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they discouered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would haue beene much endangered, if Ptolemie Euergetes, who came against him, had not beene drawne backe into his owne Countrie, by some Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptolemie, in defence of their owne King: but rather they sided with the Ægyptian; who took Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well deserued. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this inuasion, by occasion of those domesticall troubles which recalled Euergetes home into Ægypt; went about a dangerous peece of worke, euen to make Warre vpon his owne subiects, because of their bad affection towards him; when as it had bin much better, by well-deseruing, to haue changed their hatred into loue. A great Fleet he prepared: in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that he scarce left himselfe any other hope, if that should miscarrie. Heerein he embarqued himselfe; and putting to Sea, did meet with such a tempest, as deuoured all saue himselfe, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, hauing left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned neuertheless to his great good; as anon after it seemed. For when his Subiects vnderstood, in what sort the gods (as they conceiued it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate; and, presuming that hee would thenceforth become a new man, offered vnto him their seruice with great alacritie. This reuiued him, and filled him with such spirit; as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Ægyptian, hee made ready a mighty Armie for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had beene at Sea. Hee was vanquished by Ptolemie in a great battaile: whence hee escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late shipwracke. Hasting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemie would soone be at his heeles; He wrote vnto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteene yeres old, but extreamely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himselfe great. Hee leuied a mighty Armie of the Gaules; wherewith he set forward to helpe his brother, or rather to get what he could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolemie being aduertised: and hauing no desire to put himselfe in danger more than needed; tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeeres. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Ægyptian Warre, but his brother Antiochus came vpon him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to haue the better Armie. So Seleucus was vanquished againe; and saued himselfe, with so few about him, that he was verily supposed to haue perished in the battaile. Thus did Gods iustice take reuenge of those murders, by which the Crowne was purchased; and settled (as might haue been thought) on the head of this bloudie King. Antiochus was very glad to heare of his brothers death, as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gaules, his Mercenaries, were gladder then He. For when he ledde them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, being in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarians tooke counsaile against him, and deuised how to strippe him of all that he had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to doe what should be best pleasing to themselues, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransome himselfe with money, as if he had beene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended but little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to trie his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great marualle, since he had great reason to stand in no lesse feare of the Gaules his owne souldiers, than of the enemy with whom he had to deale. After this, Eumenes wonne much in Aſia, whileſt Antiochus went againſt his brother. In the ſecond battell, fought betweene the brethren, Seleucus had the vpper hand; and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, (which ſurname was giuen him, becauſe he ſought his prey vpon euery one, without care whether he were prouoked or not) ſoared away as farre as he could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gaules. Hauing fetcht a great compaſſe through Meſopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes tooke him vp. Hee was entertained very louingly in outward ſhew; but with a meaning to betray him. This he ſoone perceiued: and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length hee reſolued to beſtow himſelfe vpon Ptolemie; his owne conſcience telling him, what euill hee had meant vnto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good hee was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelitie can finde no ſure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderſtood the perfidious & turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore hee layd him vp in cloſe priſon: whence, though by meanes of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, hee fell into the hands of theeues, by whom he was murdered. Neare about the ſame time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled againſt him, during his wars with his brother. He therefore made a iourney againſt Arſaces founder of the Parthian kingdome: wherein his euill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered ſo cloſely to him, that he was taken priſoner. Arſaces dealt friendly with him, and diſmiſſed him, hauing euery way giuen him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fall from his horſe, and ſo ended his vnhappy reigne of twenty yeres. He had to wife Laodice, the ſiſter of Andromachus, one of his moſt truſty Captaines: which was father vnto that Achæus, who making his aduantage of this affinitie, became ſhortly after (as he ſtiled himſelfe) a king; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in thoſe parts. By Laodice he had two ſonnes; Seleucus the third, ſurnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeeres in which time he made warre vpon Attalus the firſt, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of body through ſickneſſe, & in want of mony, He could not keepe his men of warre in good order: and finally hee was ſlaine by treaſon of Nicanor, and Apaturius a Gaule. His death was reuenged by Achæus, who ſlue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled very wiſely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, being then a Childe.

Warre betweene* Antiochus and Philopator. The rebellion of Molo: an Expedition of Antiochus againſt him. Of Achæus, and his rebellion; his greatneſſe, and his fall. Antiochus his Expedition againſt the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

ANtiochus was ſcarcely fifteene yeeres olde, when he began his reigne, which laſted ſixe and thirty yeeres. In his Minoritie, He was wholly gouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that hee found in any of the Kings faithfull ſeruants. This vilde qualitie in a Counſailour of ſuch great place, how harmefull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himſelfe; the ſucceſſe of things will ſhortly diſcouer.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemie Euergetes King of Ægypt died; and left his heire Ptolemie Philopator, a yong Boy likewiſe, as hath elſewhere beene remembred. This was that Euergetes, who relieued Aratus and the Achæans: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes; and louingly entertained him, when he was chaced out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the laſt good King of the race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was giuen to him by the Ægyptians; not ſo much for the great ſpoyles which he brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recouered ſome of

thoſe Images or Idols, which Cambyſes, when hee conquered Ægypt, had carried into Perſia. He was ready to haue made war vpon the Iewes, for that Onias their high Prieſt, out of meer couetouſneſſe of mony, refuſed to pay vnto him his yerely tribute of 20. talents: but he was pacified by the wiſdome of Joſephus a Iew, to whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Cuſtomes that belonged vnto him, in thoſe parts of Syria which he held. For Cœleſyria, with Paleſtina & all thoſe parts of the Country that lay neereſt vnto Ægypt, were held by the Ægyptian; either as hauing fallen to the ſhare of Ptolemie the firſt, at ſuch time as the great Antigonus was vanquiſhed & ſlaine in the battel at Ipſus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troubleſome and vnhappy reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that laſted for many ſucceeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemie Euergetes reigned ſixe and twenty yeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirtie and ninth Olympiad. It may ſeeme by that, which we finde in the Prologue vnto Ieſus the ſonne of Sirach his booke, that he ſhould haue reigned a much longer time. For Sigacides there ſaith, that he came into Ægypt in the eight and thirtieth yere, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that thoſe eight and thirty yeeres, were the yeeres of Ieſus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Iewes did otherwhiles reckon) from ſome notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counſailer, and in a manner the Protectour of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre againſt the Ægyptian; for the recouery of Cœleſyria and the Countries adioyning. This counſaile was very vnſeaſonably giuen; when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion; and ſought to make himſelfe abſolute Lord of that rich Country. Neuertheleſſe Hermias, being more froward than wiſe, maintained ſtiffely, that it was moſt expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to ſend forth againſt a rebellious Captain, other Captaines that were faithfull; whileſt He in perſon made warre vpon one, that was like himſelfe, a King. No man durſt gaine-ſay the reſolution of Hermias; who therefore ſent Xenætas an Achæan, with ſuch forces as he thought expedient, againſt the Rebell; whileſt in the mean ſeaſon an Army was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Cœleſyria. The King hauing marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and ſo ouer the Deſerts into the Vallie of Marſyas, betweene the Mountains of Libanus and Anti-libanus; found his way there ſtopped by Theodotus an Ætolian, that ſerued vnder Ptolemie. So hee conſumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenætas, his Captaine, was deſtroyed with his whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrie, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenætas, whileſt hee was yet on his iourney, and drew neere to the Riuer of Tygris; receiued many aduertiſements, by ſuch as fledde ouer vnto him from the Enemie, That the followers of Molo were, for the moſt part, againſt their wills, drawne by their Commander to beare armes againſt their King. This report was not altogether falſe; but Molo himſelf ſtood in ſome doubt leſt his followers would leaue him in time of neceſſity. Xenætas therefore making ſhew, as if he had prepared to paſſe the Riuer by Boats in face of his Enemie; left in the night time ſuch as hee thought meet to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tygris, in a place tenne miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and ſent forth his horſe to giue impediment: but hearing that Xenætas could not ſo bee ſtopped; Hee himſelfe diſlodged, and tooke his iourney towards Media; leauing all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as diſtruſting the faith of his owne ſouldiors: or whether thereby to deceiue his Enemie; the great folly of Xenætas made his ſtratagem proſperous. For Xenætas, hauing borne himſelfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias by whom he was aduanced vnto this charge; did now preſume, that all ſhould giue way to his authority; without putting him to much trouble of vſing the ſword. Wherefore hee ſuffered his men to feaſt, with the prouiſions which they found ready in the forſaken Campe: or rather he commanded them ſo to doe, by making Proclamation, That they ſhould cheriſh vp themſelues againſt the iourney, which he intended to take next day, in purſuit of the Rebels that fledde. And to the ſame purpoſe hee buſied himſelfe, in tranſporting the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other ſide of Tigris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily returne the same night. Wherefore vnderstanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made such haste backe vnto them, that he came vpon them early in the morning; whilest they were yet heauy with the wine and other good cheere, that they had spent at supper. So Xenætas and a very few with him, died fighting in defence of the Campe: the rest were slaughtered, without making resistance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Campe on the other side of Tigris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captaines flying thence, to saue their owne liues. In the heat of this victorie, the Rebell marched vnto Seleucia, which he presently tooke: and, mastering within a little while the Prouince of Babylonia, and all the Countrie downe to the Red-Sea, or Bay of Persia, Hee hasted vnto Susa; where at his first comming, he won the City: but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned backe to Seleucia, there to giue order concerning this businesse.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilest he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Marsyas; filled him with great sorrow, and his Campe with trouble. Hee tooke counsaile what to doe in this needfull case; and was well aduised by Epigenes the best man of warre he had about him, to let alone this Enterprise of Cœlosyria; and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This counsaile was put in execution with all conuenient haste. Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soone after slaine, by the practice of Hermias; who could not endure to heare good counsaile giuen, contrary to his owne good liking and allowance. In the iourney against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more auaileable, then any oddes which hee had of the Rebell in strength. Molo distrusted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his late good successe, nor any other consideration, would serue to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherfore he thought it safest for him to assaile the Kings Campe in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discouered by some that fled ouer from him to the King. This caused him to returne backe to his Campe: which, by some errour, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in sight. The King was thus forward in giuing battaile to Molo, vpon confidence which he had that many would reuolt vnto him. Neither was he deceiued in this his beliefe. For not a few men, or Ensignes: but al the left wing of the enemie, which was opposite vnto the King, changed side forthwith as soon as euer they had sight of the Kings person; and were ready to do him seruice against Molo. This was enough to haue wonne the Victorie: but Molo shortned the worke, by killing himselfe; as did also diuers of his friends, who for feare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne swords.

After this Victorie came ioyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married vnto Antiochus a while before, had brought foorth a sonne. Fortune seemed bountifull vnto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what vse he could, of her friendly disposition while it lasted: Being now in the Easterne parts of his kingdome, He iudged it conuenient to visit his Frontiers, were it onely to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered vpon him. Hereunto his Counsailer Hermias gaue assent: not so much respecting the Kings honour, as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe. For if it should come to passe, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualtie: then made hee no doubt of becomming Protector to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthening his owne Gouernment. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atrōpatians; hauing the greatest part of his kingdome, situate betweene the Caspian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very olde and fearefull; and therefore yeelded vnto whatsoeuer conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this iourney Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Vpon the way, a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truely, how odious he was to the people; and how dangerous hee would be shortly vnto the Kings owne life. Antiochus beleeued this, hauing long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring, for feare of him, to vtter his suspitions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done, hee being trained foorth by a sleight a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to haue vsed so much Art, in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howsoeuer he seemed gracious whilest he was aliue: yet they that for feare had beene most obsequious to him, whilest he were in case to do them hurt, was as ready as the foremost, to speake of him as hee had deserued, when once they were secure of him: Yea, his wife and children lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the wiues and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outragiously, the longer that they had beene concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of these Expeditions which he tooke in hand; was bold to set a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a King. His purpose was to haue inuaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and studie to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achæus; nor yet dissembled the notice which hee had taken, of these his traiterous purposes: but wrote vnto him, signifying that hee knew all; and vpbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be vnpardonable. By these meanes he emboldned the Traytor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Cœlosyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopater in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a very strong City neere to the mouth of the Riuer Orontes; which ere long hee wonne, partly by force, partly by corrupting with brybes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the great, who founded it, gaue the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Euergetes hauing lately won it, might, if it had so pleased him, haue changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endlesse memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their owne; than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodotus the Ætolian, hee that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Cœlosyria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now grown sorrie, that he had vsed so much faith & diligence, in seruice of an vnthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercenarie, he began to haue regard to his own profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselfe vnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthy of these two Kings; He offered to deliuer vp vnto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolemais. Whilest he was deuising about this treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus: his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull then himselfe. But Antiochus hasting to his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good fleete of the Ægyptian Kings that was in those Hauens: but of so many other Townes in that Countrie, as emboldned him to thinke vpon making a iourney into Ægypt itselfe. Agathocles and Sosibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemy himselfe being loth to haue his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safetie of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make prouision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might bee, for the warre: and neuertheless, at the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadours to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this businesse, Embassadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Ætolians; according to the vsuall courtesie of the Greekes, desiring to take vp the quarrell.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Sosibius: who intreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilest this treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the warre: wherein these two Counsailors perswaded themselues reasonably, that the victory would be their own, if they could get, for mony, a sufficient number of the Greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Gouernours of Ægypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gaue the readier beleefe, not onely for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadors, comming from Memphis, discoursed vnto him al after one manner; as being all deceiued, by the cunning of Agathocles & his fellow. Antiochus therefore hauing wearied himselfe, at the long siege of a Towne called Dura, which he could not winne: and being desirous to refresh himselfe and his Armie in Seleucia, during the winter which then ramoon, granted to the Ægyptian a Truce for foure moneths, with promise that hee would bee ready to hearken vnto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as hee would faine haue seemed, but onely to lull his enemies asleepe, whilest he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Achæus to some good order, whose treason daily grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Ægyptian would haue vsed, He vsed himselfe; as presuming, that when time of the yere better serued, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld vnto him, since Ptolemy prouided not for their defence. Neuertheless, hee gaue audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Ægypt: pleasing himselfe well, to dispute about the iustice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were iust or no. Hee said, that it was agreed betweene Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could winne it from Antigonus, should bee giuen in possession to Seleucus: and that this bargaine was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Ipsus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargaine. They said, that Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, had wonne Cœlosyria, and the Prouinces adioyning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recouer his Prouince of Babylon, and the Countries about the Riuer of Euphrates. Thus whilest neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemie would needs haue Achæus comprehended in the League betweene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shamefull thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and seek to ioyn him in Confederacie with his own Souereigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe; contrary to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemie, with a very puissant Armie, was comming vp against him out of Ægypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemie, he was encountred on the way by those Captaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him the yere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuertheless he draue them: and, proceeding onward in his iourney, wonne so many places, that hee greatly increased his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with diuers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neere together: many Captaines of Ptolemie forsooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Ægyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battaile was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Ægyptians or Asiatiques were the better Souldiers (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greekes, Thracians, and Gaules) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arsinoe his sister and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the braue deeds of his Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, whereby to valew themselues. Antiochus had the more Elephants; as also his, being of Asia, had they beene fewer would haue beaten those of Africke. Wherefore by the aduantage of those beasts, He draue the enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein he fought himselfe. But Ptolemy had the better men; by whose valour he brake the Grosse of his Enemies battaile; and won the victory; whilest Antiochus was heedlesly following vpon those, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field aboue seuenty thousand foot, and sixe thousand horse; whereof though he lost scarce ten thousand foot, and not foure hundred horse; yet the fame of his ouerthrow tooke from him all those places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to stand in feare, lest Ptolemie and Achæus, setting vpon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors to the Ægyptian to treat of peace: which was readily granted; it being much against the nature of Ptolemie to vexe himselfe thus with the tedious businesse of warre. So Ptolemie, hauing staied three moneths in Syria, returned home into Ægypt clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subiects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.

Achæus was not comprised in the League betweene these two Kings: or if hee had beene beene included therein; yet would not the Ægyptian haue taken the paines, of making a second Expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was hee confident without great reason: For besides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was hee, as Mole the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard otherwise, and carried beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Cousin germane to the King, as hath beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a yonger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her sister the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestie vnto him, and had made his followers greatly to respect him, euen as one to whom a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemie of Ægypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelyhoods came to nothing: For the King of Pontus, if hee would meddle in that quarrell betweene his sonnes-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Ægyptian: He was not only slothfull, but hindred by a rebellion of his owne subiects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Ægypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serue in the late Expedition, beganne to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferiour to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they lesse esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercenarie Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in streight subiection. Thus brake out a warre betweene the King and his subiects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemie thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might haue beene spent, as he thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, He had no sooner made his peace with the Ægyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of warre against Achæus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebell, and finde him worke on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had pent vp Achæus into the Citie of Sardes; where he held him about two yeeres besieged. The Citie was very strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelyhood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Castle it selfe was vpon a very high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable, as also the Towne-wall adioyning to the Castle, in that part which was called the Sawe, was in like manner situate vpon steepe Rocks, and almost inaccessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottom, wherein lay the dead carkases of Horses, and other beasts, yea, and sometimes of men, vsed to be throwne. Now it was obserued by Lagoras, that the Rauens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reason of their food which was there neuer wanting, vsed to flie vp vnto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch vpon the walls, where they rested without any disturbance. Obseruing this often, hee reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were left vnguarded, as being thought vnapproachable. Hereof he informed the King: who approued his iudgement, and gaue vnto him the leading of such men, as he desired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceiued: and though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those Rocks, and whilest a generall assault was made, entred the Towne in that part, which was at other times vnguarded, then vnthought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, vnder Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Croesus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a losse many ages past, and therefore out of memorie. Achæus held still the Castle: which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was very well stored with all necessaries; and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it; hauing none other hope to preuaile, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the vsuall rediousnesse of expectation, his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians;

Arians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected Kingdomes taken out of his Dominions, vpon which they still incroched. But he thought it not safe, to let Achæus breake loose againe. On the other side there were some Agents of Ptolemie the Aegyptian, and good friends vnto Achæus; that made it their whole studie, how to deliuer this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed, that when he should appeare in the Countreyes vnder Taurus, hee would soone haue an Armie at command, and bee strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the wayes in the Countrey, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rockes, whereon the Castle of Sardes stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which hee should receiue at the hands of Ptolemie, as well as of Antiochus; to doe his best for performance of their desire. He vndertooke the businesse: and gaue such likely reasons of bringing all to effect, that they wrote vnto Achæus, by one Arianus, a trustie messenger, whom Bolis found meanes to conueigh into the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Achæus held most assured. They also wrote vnto him in priuie characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none saue hee and they were acquainted: whereby hee knew, that it was no fained deuice of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger; hee was a trustie fellow, and one whom Achæus found, by examination, heartily affected vnto their side. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were, That he should be confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had wonne vnto the businesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; vnder whom he had the command of those Cretans, which helde one of the Forts that blocked vp the Castle of Sardes. Neuertheless other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himselfe to some aduenture. When the messeger had therfore passed to and fro: it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should come speake with Achæus, and conduct him foorth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, saue onely by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrimen,* some few excepted, haue beene, and still are) false knaues. These two held a consultation together, that was, as Polybius obserues it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the safety of him whose deliuerie they vndertooke, nor touching the discharge of their owne faith; but onely how to get most with least adoe and danger to themselues. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally share betweene them ten Talents, which they had already receiued in hand: and then, That they would reueale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliuer Achæus vnto him, if they might bee well rewarded both with present monie, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a seruice, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad, than were the friends of Achæus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get vp into the Castle, and conueigh Achæus thence: Hee first went with Cambylus to speake with the King, who gaue him very priuate audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberall promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull vnto Ptolemie whom hee had long serued; Hee accompanied Arianus vp into the Castle. At his comming thither, Hee was louingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But hee discoursed so well, and with such grauitie; that there appeared no reason of distrusting either his faith or iudgement. Hee was an olde Souldiour, had long beene a Captayne vnder Ptolemie, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was inuited by honourable and faithfull men. Hee had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other countriman of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already sundrie times giuen safe passage and repassage vnto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an aduenture stirred vp some diffidence: so Achæus therefore dealt wisely, and sayde, That hee would yet stay in the Castle a little longer: but that hee meant to send away with Bolis three or foure of his friends; from whom when hee receiued better aduertisement, concerning the likelyhood of the enterprise, then would he issue forth himselfe. Hereby he took order, not to commit himselfe wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But as Polybius well notes, hee did not consider that he

*Among these few I doe not except one, calling himselfe Eudamon Iohn Andrew a Cretan; who in one of his late shameleste libels, wherein he traduceth our King, Religion, and Country, with al the good & worthy mē of whō he could learne the names, hath, by inserting my name twice belied mee; in calling mee a Puritan, & one that haue been dangerous vnto my Soueraigne. It is an honour to bee ill spoken of by so diligent a supporter of Treasons, and Architect of Lies: in regard wherof I may not denie him the commendatiō of Creticisme no lesse voluminous, than he in multiplicitie of name is beyond any the Cretians in elder times, that were alwaies Lyers, euil beasts, and slow bellies.

he played the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to ſay, That he had to doe with one, whoſe knauery could not bee auoided by circumſpection. Bolis and Cambylus had layd their plots thus, That if Achæus came forth alone, then ſhould hee eaſily be taken by the ambuſh prepared for him: if he were accõpanied with many of his friends, then ſhould Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had troden it oft; and Bolis following behinde, ſhould haue an eye vpon Achæus, to preuent him not onely from eſcaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwiſe killing himſelfe: to the end that being taken aliue, Hee might bee to Antiochus the more welcome Preſent. And in ſuch order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the reſt following, as the way ſerued, and Bolis in the Rere. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpoſe, till the very inſtant of his departure. Then ſignified hee the matter to his Wife Laodice; and comforting her with hope as well as hee could, appointed foure of his ſpeciall friends to beare him companie. They were all diſguiſed: and one of them alone tooke vpon him to haue knowledge of the Greeke tongue; ſpeaking & anſwering as need ſhould require, for all, as if the reſt had beene Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deuiſing vpon his buſineſſe, and much perplexed. For (ſaith Polybius) Though he were of Crete, and prone to ſurmiſe any thing to the miſchiefe of another: yet could hee not ſee in the darke, nor know which of them was Achæus, or whether Achæus himſelfe were there. The way was very vneaſie, and in ſome places dangerous; eſpecially to thoſe that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to ſtay in diuers places, and helpe one another vp or downe. But vpon euery occaſion they were all of them very officious towards Achæus; lending him their hands, and taking ſuch care of him, as eaſily gaue Bolis to vnderſtand, that he was the man: and ſo by their vnſeaſonable duty, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait; Bolis whiſtled, and preſently claſped Achæus about the middle, holding him faſt that he could not ſtirre. So they were all taken by the Ambuſh, and carried forthwith to Antiochus: who ſate vp watching in his Pauillion, expecting the euent. The ſight of Achæus, brought in bound vnto him, did ſo aſtoniſh the King, that hee was vnable to ſpeake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might haue kept him from admiration: as alſo the next morning betimes aſſembling his friends together, He condemned Achæus to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not moued with pitty towards this vnhappy man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes, that wrung from him theſe teares: as alſo the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be ſo, that ſuch a courſe as this of his, in employing two miſchieuous knaues againſt one Traitour, doth not rarely ſucceed well; according to that Spaniſh Prouerbe, A vn traydor dos alleuoſos. The death of Achæus brought ſuch aſtoniſhment vpon thoſe which held the Caſtle, that after a while they gaue vp the place and themſelues vnto the King; whereby he got entire poſſeſſion of all to him belonging in the leſſer Aſia.

40 Some yeeres paſſed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his Expedition againſt the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obſcure beginnings, and commonly ſubiect vnto thoſe that ruled in Media. In the great ſhuffling for Prouinces, after the death of Alexander, the Gouernment ouer them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of ſmall regard; ſhortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus: vnder whoſe poſterity they continued vntill the Reigne of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The luſtfull inſolencie of one of theſe Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquiſhed and thought to be ſlaine by the Gaules; did ſtirre vp Arſaces, a Noble man of the Countrie, to ſeeke reuenge of iniuries done, and animate them to rebell. So he ſlue the Kings Lieutenant; made himſelfe King of the Parthians and Lord of Hyrcania; fought proſperouſly with thoſe that diſturbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Callinicus priſoner in battaile, whom he royally entertained, and diſmiſſed. Hereby he wonne reputation as a lawfull King: and by good gouernment of his Country, procured vnto himſelfe ſuch loue of his Subiects, that his name was continued vnto his ſucceſſors; like as that of the Ptolemies in Ægypt, and that of the Cæſars afterwards in Rome. Much about the ſame time the Bactrians rebelled: though theſe at length, and all belonging vnto the Seleucida beyond Euphrates, increaſed the Parthians Dominion. Now Antiochus went againſt them with ſo ſtrong an Armie, that they durſt not meet him in plaine field; but kept themſelues in Woods, or places of ſtrength, and defended the Streights and paſſages of Mountaines. The reſiſtances they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him ſo great a multitude, and ſo well ſorted, as hee needed not to turne out of the way, from thoſe that lay fortified againſt him, in Woods and Streights between their Mountaines; it being eaſie to ſpare out of ſo great a number, as many as fetching a compaſſe about, might eyther get aboue the Enemies heads; or come behinde, and charge them on the backe. Thus did hee often imploy againſt them his light armature: wherewith hee cauſed them to diſlodge, and giue way vnto his Phalanx; vpon which they durſt not aduenture themſelues in open ground. Arſaces, the ſecond of the name, (for his Father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though hee was confident in the fidelitie of his owne ſubiects; yet feared to encounter with ſo mightie an inuader. His hope was, that the bad wayes, and Deſerts, would haue cauſed Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to giue ouer the iourney, without proceeding much further. This not ſo falling out: Hee cauſed the Wells and Springs in the Wildernesſe, through which his Enemie muſt paſſe, to bee dammed vp and ſpoyled. By which meanes, and the reſiſtance before ſpoken of, when he could not preuaile, Hee withdrew himſelfe out of the way; ſuffering the Enemie to take his pleaſure for a time, in waſting the Countrie: wherein, without ſome victorie obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Arſaces was nothing ſtrongly prouided for the warre. Wherefore he marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania; where hee wanne Tambrace, the chiefe Citie of that Prouince. This indignitie, and many other loſſes, cauſed Arſaces at length, when he had gathered an Armie that ſeemed ſtrong enough, to aduenture a battailes. The iſſue thereof was ſuch, as gaue to neither of the Kings hope of accompliſhing his deſires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Arſaces craued Peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amiſſe, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a ſubiect.

The next Expedition of Antiochus, was againſt Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled againſt him or his Anceſtors: but hauing gotten the Kingdome from thoſe that had rebelled, kept it to himſelfe. With Euthydemus hee fought a battaile by the Riuer Arius, where he had the victory. But the victorie was not ſo greatly to his honour; as was the teſtimony which he gaue of his owne priuate valour, in obtaining it. Hee was thought that day to haue demeaned him more couragiouſly, than did any one man in all his Armie. His horſe was ſlaine vnder him; and hee himſelfe receiued a wound in his mouth, whereby hee loſt ſome of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, Hee withdrew himſelfe backe vnto the furthermoſt parts of his Kingdome, and afterwards protracted the Warre, ſeeking how to end it by compoſition. So Embaſſadors paſſed betweene the Kings: Antiochus complayning, That a Country of his was vniuſtly vſurped from him: Euthydemus anſwering, That he had wonne it from the children of the Vſurpers: and further, That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retayned in order, ſaue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered vpon the Scythians, with whom if they ſhould ioyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Prouinces that lay behind them. Theſe allegations, together with his owne wearineſſe, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, vpon reaſonable Conditions. Demetrius, the ſonne of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his Father as Embaſſadour in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little availeable vnto a good Concluſion: for Antiochus liked him ſo well, that he promiſed to giue him in marriage, one of his owne daughters; and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the kingdome, cauſing him neuertheleſſe to deliuer vp all his Elephants; as alſo to binde himſelfe by oath, to ſuch Couenants as he thought requiſite.

So Antiochus leauing the Bactrian in quiet, made a iourney ouer Caucſaus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagaſenus, King of the Indians, the ſociety that had beene betweene their Anceſtors. The Indians had remained ſubiect vnto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his warre againſt Antigonus, raiſed part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigonus (after his victory) turned Weſtward, and was ouer-buſied in a great ciuill warre: then then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, ſtirre vp his Countrymen to Rebellion; making himſelfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him as Protector of their libertie. This Office fice and Title hee soone changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Maiestie of a King. Finally he got vnto himselfe, (hauing an Armie of sixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had beene Alexanders. In this Estate he had well confirmed himselfe, ere Seleucus Nicator could finde leisure to call him to account. Neither did Hee faint, or humble himselfe, at the comming of Seleucus: but met him in field, as readie to defend his owne; so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and affinitie with him, taking onely a reward of fiftie Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdomes, was continued by some Offices of loue betweene their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fiftie: as also he was promised, to haue some treasure sent after him; which he left one to receiue. Thus parted these two great Kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any businesse worthy of remembrance with the Westerne Countreyes. The posteritie of Sandrocottus, is thought to haue retained that kingdome vnto the dayes of Augustus Cæsar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadours with Presents, and an Epistle written in Greeke: wherein, among other things, He said, That He had command ouer sixe hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome, in diuers Ages, euen vnto the time of Constantine the Great: being all peraduenture of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophagasenus carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiuing Presents; and after marched home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Asia, but on the hither side of Taurus, humbled themselues vnto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his owne Greatnesse within few yeeres ensuing, by presuming to stand vpon points with the Romans; whose Greatnesse was the same indeed, that his was onely in seeming.

§. III.

The lewd Reigne of Ptolemie Philopator in Ægypt: with the tragicall ende of his fauourites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to warre on the yong childe Ptolemie Epiphanes, the sonne of Philopator. His irresolution in preparing for diuers warres at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. Hee seekes to hold amitie with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him; intending neuertheless to haue warre with him. His doings against the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrell to him.

HIs Expedition being finished; Antiochus had leisure to repose himselfe awhile: and studie which way to conuert the terror of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeeres Ptolemie Philopator died: leauing his sonne Ptolemie Epiphanes, a yong Boy, his successor in the kingdome; vnlikely by him to be well defended, against a neighbour so mightie and ambitious. This Ptolemie surnamed Philopator, that is to say, a louer of his Father, is thought to haue had that surname giuen him in mere derision; as hauing made away both his Father and Mother. His yong yeeres, being newly past his childhood when he beganne to reigne, may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beastlinesse of all his following life, makes him not vnlike to haue done any mischiefe, whereof hee could bee accused. Hauing wonne the battaile at Raphia, He gaue himselfe ouer to sensuality; and was wholly gouerned by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her instigation Hee murdered his owne wife and sister; which had aduentured herselfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him vndertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenantships of his Prouinces, with all Commands in his Armie, and Offices whatsoeuer; were wholly referred vnto the disposition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and of Oenanthe a filthy Bawd that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to the great griefe of all the Countrie, till Philopator died: who hauing reigned seuenteene yeeres, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphanes a childe of fiue yeres old, begotten on Arsinoe that was his sister and wife. After the Kings death; Agathocles began to take vpon him, as Protector of yong Epiphanes, and Gouernour of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Ægypt with Ptolemy the first, and

and would not be accounted Ægyptians; as neither would the Kings themselues) and bringing forth vnto them his sister Agathocles, with the yong King in her armes; began a solemne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the childe into the armes of his sister, but vnto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdome did now relye. He besought them therefore that they would be faithfull, and, as great neede was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiterously went about to set the Diademe vpon his owne head, being a meere stranger to the Royall bloud. Herewithall he produced before them a witnesse, that should iustifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shameless dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake vp the Assembly: He that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings fauour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified; thought to goe to worke, as had formerly beene his manner, by vsing his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He haled out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumours, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old Kings name) to meete in knots together, and vtter one to another their minds; wherein they had conceiued extreame hate, against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present iniurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moued with feare of harme; which, in way of requitall, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citie. For Hee was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernement, as afterwards he proued; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the prouision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motiues wrought with the people: so by the remedy which Agathocles vsed, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred vnto vprore. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom hee suspected of conspiracie against him; and deliuered him vnto a follower of his owne, to be examined by torture. This poore Souldior was carried into an inner roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparrell to be tormented. But whilest the whippes were brought forth, and all things euen in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought vnto the minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leauing Moeragenes the Souldior alone by himselfe, and the dores open. He perceiuing this, naked as he was, conueighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians; of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priuiledges, as are the Turkes Ianizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus beene vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leaue him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no lesse adoe than the Souldiours, though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Oenanthe fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, by his permission which he easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered vp to the furie of the people. Agathocles himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked vp and downe the streetes; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of iustice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Ægypt, serued well to stirre vp King Antiochus; who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon young Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same desire, to get what part he could of the childes estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punicke Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therefore the Ægyptians addressed themselues, and craued helpe against these two Kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into couenant to diuide betweene them, all that belonged vnto this Orphan; whose Father had beene Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Ægypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; He was very soone found busied, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Ætolian, being a Pensioner to the Ægyptian, was sent into Greece to raise an Armie of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Ægypt, I doe not finde: and therefore thinke it not improbable, that He was sent thither onely one of the three Embassadors, ° in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath beene showed before. As for Scopas; He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie: where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, He subdued the Iewes; who seeme to haue yeelded themselues a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiuing helpe from Ægypt. But it was not long, ere all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next yeere following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeere that Philip was beaten at Cynoscephalæ; Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recouered all that had beene lost. Among the rest, the Iewes with great willingnesse returned vnder his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

* Iustin l. 30.

Vid. Ioseph. ant. Iud. l. 12. c. 3.

The Land of Ægypt this great King did forbeare to inuade; and gaue it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie: either hoping, as may seeme, that the Countrie would willingly submit it selfe vnto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarrie; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Westerne parts of Asia, whilest Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. It appeares that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betweene Attalus, Philip, and the Greekes, promised to affoord him great aduantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellespont. On the other side, the state of Ægypt being such as hath beene declared, seemed easily to be swallowed vp at once. One while therefore he tooke what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Iewes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Ægyptian) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Ægypt alone, He was about to make inuasion vpon Attalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embassadours, and desisted from that enterprise. Hauing thus farre gratified the Romans; He sends Embassadours to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amitie betweene him and them. It is not lightly to be ouerpassed, That these his Embassadours were louingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answere of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answere of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not standing much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour, they were content to giue good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to winne some Townes elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; yet withall hee sends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit he can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution; How notwithstanding his attempts vpon both of their Kingdomes, hee offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendshippes, at one and the same time, when hee sought to make each of them a spoyle. Thus was hee acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplicable desire of repugnancies; which is a disease of great, and ouer-swelling fortunes. Howsoeuer it was, He sent an Armie to Sardes by Land, vnder two of his owne sonnes: willing them there to stay for him; whilest he himselfe with a Fleete of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to passe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Ægyptian. It was a notable Act of the Rhodians, that, whilest the warre of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they aduentured vpon this great Antiochus. They sent vnto him a proud Embassage: whereby they gaue him to vnderstand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because he should not ioyne with Philip their enemy, and helpe him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King: yet he tempered himselfe, and without any ſhew of indignation gaue a gentle anſwere; partly himſelfe to their Embaſſadours; partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embaſſadors which he thither ſent. He ſhewed his deſire; to renew the ancient Confederacies betweene his Anceſtors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, leſt his comming ſhould tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would moleſt: they were (he ſaid) his very good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proofe, than the entertainment and anſwere by them newly giuen to his Embaſſadors.

The Rhodians appeare to haue beene a cunning people, and ſuch as could foreſee what weather was like to happen. This anſwere of the King, and the relation of what had paſſed betweene his Embaſſadors and the Senate, moued them not a whit; when they were informed ſhortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoſcephala. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the ſtronger ſide. Wherefore they would not be contented to ſit ſtill; vnleſſe the Townes on the South Coaſt of Aſia, belonging to Ptolemie their friend and Confederate, were ſuffered to be at quiet. Herein alſo they did well; for that they had euer beene greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore, in this time of neceſſitie, gaue what aide they could vnto all the ſubiects of the Ægyptian in thoſe parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the ſonne of Attalus, prognoſticate as concerning the warre that followed, betweene Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to beſtow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage: Hee excuſed himſelfe, and would not haue her. Attalus and Philetærus, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would ſurely make warre vpon Antiochus; and therein finally preuaile. Wherefore he ſaid, That by abſtaining from this affinitie, it ſhould be in his power to ioyne with the Romans, and ſtrengthen himſelfe greatly with their friendſhip. Contrariwiſe, if he leaned to Antiochus: as hee muſt be partaker in his ouerthrow; ſo was he ſure to be oppreſſed by him, as by an ouer-mightie neighbor, if he happened to win the victory.

Antiochus himſelfe wintered about Epheſus: where he tooke ſuch order as he thought conuenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampſacus to obedience; that had vſurped their libertie, and obſtinately ſtroue to maintaine it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he ſailed vnto the Helleſpont: where hauing won ſome Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he paſſed ouer into Europe ſide; and in ſhort ſpace maſtered the Cherſoneſus. Thence went he to Lyſimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and deſtroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garriſon thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Ætolians obiected as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppreſſed Lyſimachia, by thruſting thereinto a Garriſon. Hereupon Philip made anſwere, that his Garriſon did not oppreſſe the Towne, but ſaue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and ſackt it, as ſoone as the Macedonians were gone. That this anſwere was good and ſubſtanciall, though it were not acceptable as ſuch; might appeare by the miſerable caſe, in which Antiochus found Lyſimachia at his comming thither. For the Towne was vtterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into ſlauery. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it reedified: as alſo to redeeme thoſe that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were diſperſed in the Countrie thereabout. Likewiſe he was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promiſes, new inhabitants; and to repleniſh the Citie with the wonted frequencie. Now to the end that men ſhould not be terrified from comming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: hee tooke a iournie in hand againſt thoſe barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armie; leauing the other halfe to repaire the Citie. Theſe paines he tooke; partly in regard of the conuenient ſituation, and former glory of Lyſimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recouer and eſtabliſh the dominion in thoſe parts, which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lyſimachus, and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he ſhall dearely pay: and as after that victory againſt Lyſimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed ſhortly; ſo ſhall a deadly wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus enſue very ſpeedily, after the reconqueſt of the ſame Countrie, which was the laſt of Seleucus his purchaſes.

The Romans hold friendly correſpondence with Antiochus, during their warre with Philip: *after which they quarrell with him. FOr the Romans, though they were vnable to ſmother their deſire of warre with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much againſt their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant ſhortly to make good, of this intended warre, ſo long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furniſhed, by this enterpriſe of the Kings about Lyſimachia. It was not long, ſince King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their warre with Philip, could obtaine of them none other helpe againſt Antiochus, than Embaſſadors to ſpeake for him; becauſe the one of theſe Kings was held no leſſe a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards paſſe betweene them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus at the requeſt of their Embaſſadors, withdrew his Inuaſion from the Kingdome of Pergamus: alſo very ſhortly after he ſent Embaſſadors to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them. This was whileſt as yet they were buſied with Philip; and therefore had reaſon to anſwere his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward ſhew. But when the Macedonian warre was at an end, and all, or moſt of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients vnto the Romans: then was all this good correſpondence changed, into termes of worſe, but more plaine meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counſailors ſent from Rome, required (as hath been *ſhewed before) with a commination of warre, this kings gratulation of their victory; as alſo his long-profeſſed amitie, and deſire to continue in the ſame. * Ch 4. § vlt.

Theſe ten Counſailors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpoſe of the Senate: whereof yet it ſeemes that he was not ignorant before; ſince, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they diuided themſelues to make progreſſe through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them ſhould viſit King Antiochus; and the reſt, where occaſion ſerued, vſe diligence to make a partie ſtrong againſt him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vnmindefull of the buſineſſe: wherein leſt T. Quintius, with his ten Aſſiſtants, ſhould happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was ſent from Rome of purpoſe, to deale with the King about thoſe controuerſies, that were betweene him and Ptolemie. What other priuate inſtructions Cornelius had; we may coniecture by the mannaging of this his Embaſſage. For coming to Selymbria: and there vnderſtanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, hauing beene ſent by Titus, were at Lyſimachia, He haſtned thither; whither alſo came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counſailors) from Bargilla, to be preſent at the Conference. Hegeſianax and Lyſias were alſo there; the ſame, who had lately brought from Titus thoſe peremptorie Conditions, which the Embaſſadours preſent ſhall expound vnto their Maſter. After a few dayes Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betweene Him and theſe Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the buſineſſe in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliuered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reaſon to deliuer backe vnto Ptolemie thoſe Townes of his, whereof hee had lately gotten poſſeſſion. Hereunto he added, and that very earneſtly, That hee muſt alſo giue vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more abſurd, than ſuch folly in the Romans; as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured ſo much, and He done nothing? Further He warned the King, that he ſhould not moleſt thoſe Cities that were free: and finally Hee demanded of him, vpon what reaſon he was come ouer with ſo great an Armie into Europe; for that other cauſe of his iournie there was none probable, than a purpoſe to make warre vpon the Romans. To this the King made anſwere, That hee wondered why the Romans ſhould ſo trouble themſelues, with thinking vpon the matters of Asia: wherewith Hee prayed them to let him alone; euen as He, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his comming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what businesse had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recouery of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countrie, He deriued it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controuersie betweene him and the other Kings, had beene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Ægyptians; but had beene seized on by them, or by others from whom they receiued them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindred by multiplicitie of businesse, from looking vnto all that was their owne. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in feare of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this Citie vpon one of his sons, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieued with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free Cities, or against the King of Ægypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himselfe, and to ioyne ere long with Ptolemie, not onely in friendship, but in a bond of neere affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refute it; would needes heare further, what the Embassadours of Smyrna and of Lampsacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselues. The Embassadors of Lampsacus being called in, beganne a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Iudges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace; forasmuch as hee had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betweene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, hauing not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a conuenient foundation of the warre by them intended: nor yet hauing purpose to depart well satisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace, were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallo-Greekes, pretend onely the goodnesse of their swords; nor yet ouer-modestly, to retaine among the Greekes an opinion of their iustice, forbeare the occasion of making themselues great. The King on the other side was wearie of these tedious ghests; that would take none answere, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolemie was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Ægypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdome; and L. Cornelius, to preuent him thereof, and set the Countrie in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassadour, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemie: which gaue him occasion to take leaue, and prepare for his Ægyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together: and the King foorthwith made ready, to be in Ægypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus he committed his Armie; and left him to ouer-see the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces Hee tooke along with him, and sailed vnto Ephesus. Thence hee sent Embassadours to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after such sort, as might stand with honestie and good faith. But as hee was further proceeding on his voyage; He was perfectly informed that Ptolemie was aliue. This made him beare another way from Ægypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grieuous shipwracke, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to haue safely recouered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: secure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treatie at Lysimachia, (at least-wise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadours that had beene sent vnto the Macedonian gaue him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; Not to rest contented with the Peace which was granted vnto him by the Romans, but to desire societie with them, whereby they should be bound to haue the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly, before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to haue awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainely, did not meane to be satisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were sollicited; and particularly the Ætolians,

That

That conſtantly and faithfully they ſhould abide in the friendſhip of the People of Rome. It was needleſſe to ſay plainly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward anſwere made by the Aetolians, declares them to haue well vnderſtood the purpoſe. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victory, as they had beene during the Warre. They that ſo complained were the moſt moderate of them. Others cryed out that they had beene wronged, and defrauded of what was promiſed vnto them: vpbrayding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not onely for their Victory ouer Philip; but euen for helping them to ſet foot in Greece, which elſe they neuer could haue done. Hereto the Roman gaue gentle anſweres: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to ſend Embaſſadors to the Senate, and vtter their griefes; and then ſhould all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended againſt Antiochus. The fame hereof arriuing at Carthage, gaue matter vnto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to picke a thanke of the Roman Senate; and to chace out of their Citie this honourable man, whom they ſo greatly hated. He had of late exerciſed his vertue againſt them in the Ciuill adminiſtration; and giuen them an ouerthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the ſway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and hauing ſubiect vnto them, the liues, goods, and fame of all the reſt. Neither did they vſe this their power with moderation: but conſpired in ſuch wiſe together, that who ſo offended any one of them, ſhould haue them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was ſure to be ſoone accuſed and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the Citie, Hannibal was choſen Prætor. By vertue of which Office; though he was ſuperiour vnto them during that yeere: yet had it not beene their manner to beare much regard vnto ſuch an annuall Magiſtrate, as at the yeeres end muſt be accountable to them, if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore ſending for one of the Quæſtors, or officers of the Treaſurie, to come and ſpeake with him: the proud Quæſtor ſet lightly thereby, and would not come. For hee was of the aduerſe Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to be choſen into the Order of Iudges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the ſpirit of future Greatneſſe. But he had not to doe with ſuch a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal ſent for him by a Purſiuant; and hauing thus apprehended him, brought him into iudgement before a publique aſſembly of the people. There he not onely ſhewed, what the vndutifull ſtubborneneſſe of this Quæſtor had beene; but how vnſufferable the inſolencie of all the Iudges at the preſent was: whoſe vnbridled power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magiſtrates. To this Oration when he perceiued that all the Citizens were attentiue and fauourable; Hee foorthwith propounded a Law, which paſſed with the generall good liking; That the Iudges ſhould be choſen from yeere to yeere, and no one man be continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had beene paſſed, before he paſſed ouer Iberus: it would not perhaps haue beene in the power of Hanno, to haue brought him vnto neceſſitie of reforming another grieuance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to leuie by Taxation layed vpon the whole Commonaltie; as wanting money in their publique Treaſurie, wherewith to defray either that, or diuers other needefull charges. Hannibal conſidering this, beganne to examine the publique Reuenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treaſurie, by wayes and meanes whatſoeuer; and in what ſort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not exhauſt the Treaſurie: but that wicked Magiſtrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greateſt part of the monies to their owne vſe, were thereby faine to loade the people with needeleſſe burdens. Hereof hee made ſuch plaine demonſtration, that theſe Robbers of the common Treaſure were compelled to reſtore, with ſhame, what they had gotten by knauerie: and ſo the Carthaginians were freed from the neceſſitie of making ſuch poore ſhifts, as formerly they had vſed, when they knew not the valew of their owne Eſtate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: ſo they of the Roman Faction, which had, ſince the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extreamely; as being by him ſtript of their ill-gotten goods, and ill-employed authoritie, both at once, euen when they thought themſelues to haue bene in full poſſeſſion of the vanquiſhed Carthage. Wherefore they ſent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew ſtrong againe, and Hannibal would ſhortly be in armes. Queſtionleſſe, if oppreſſing the Citie by iniuſtice, and robbing the Treaſurie, were the onely way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: theſe enemies to the Barchines might well crie out, That hauing done their beſt already to keepe all in quiet, they ſaw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to alleadge, than their owne inuentions: they ſaid, That Hannibal was like vnto a wilde beaſt, which would neuer be tamed: That ſecret meſſages paſt betweene him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complaine of idleneſſe, as if it were harmefull to Carthage; with what elſe to like effect they could imagine. Theſe accuſations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addreſſing their letters craftily, euery one to the beſt of his owne friends at Rome, and ſuch as were Senators; they wrought ſo well, that neither publike notice of their Conſpiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpoſe. Onely P. Scipio is ſaid to haue admoniſhed the Fathers, that they ſhould not thus diſhonourably ſubſcribe, and become Seconds to the accuſers of Hannibal: as if they would oppreſſe, by ſuborning or countenancing falſe witneſſes againſt him, the Man, againſt whom in warre they had not of long time preuailed, nor vſed their Victory in ſuch baſe manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all ſo great-minded as Scipio: they wiſhed for ſome ſuch aduantage againſt Hannibal; and were glad to haue found it. Three Embaſſadours they ſent ouer to Carthage, C. Seruilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus: whoſe very names import ſufficient cauſe of bad affection to Hannibal. Theſe hauing paſt the Sea, were entertained by thoſe that had procured their comming; and, being by them inſtructed how to carry themſelues, gaue out, That they were ſent to end ſome controuerſies, betweene the Carthaginians and Maſaniſſa. But Hannibal had kept ſuch good eſpiall vpon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: againſt which he was neuer vnprepared. It were enough to ſay, That he eſcaped them by flight: but in the actions of ſo famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearſe the particularities. Hauing openly ſhewed himſelfe, as was his manner, in the place of Aſſembly, He went forth of the Towne when it began to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though ſuch as he might well truſt. He had appointed Horſes to be in a readineſſe at a certaine place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-ſide. There had he a Shippe furniſhed with all things needefull; as hauing long expected the neceſſitie of ſome ſuch iourney. So Hee bade Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrey, more than his owne. Paſſing ouer to the Ile of Cercina; hee found there in the Hauen ſome Merchants ſhippes of Carthage. They ſaluted him reſpectiuely: and the chiefe among them beganne to enquire, whither he was bound. Hee ſaid, Hee went Embaſſadour to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Iland to make a ſacrifice; whereto Hee inuited all the Merchants, and Maſters of the Shippes. It was hote weather: and therefore He would needes hold his Feaſt vpon the ſhore; where, becauſe there wanted couert, He made them bring thither all their ſailes and yards to be vſed in ſtead of Tents. They did ſo; and feaſted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there aſleepe; and putting to Sea, held on his courſe to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was ſure not to be purſued. For the Merchants did neither make haſte to ſend any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embaſſadour: neither could they, without ſome loſſe of time, ſuch of them as made moſt ſpeede homeward, get away from Cercina; being buſied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the miſſe of ſo great a perſon was diuerſly conſtrued. Some gheſſed aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where he had beene ſeene: and then the Roman Embaſſadours, hauing none other errand thither, accuſed him (with an euill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they onely diſcouered the miſchiefe by them intended againſt him, and the malice of their Senate; miſſing the while their purpoſe, and cauſing men to vnderſtand, that He fled not thus without great reaſon.

Hannibal comming to Tyre, the Mother-Citie of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whoſe great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reaſon of affinitie betweene their Cities, thought themſelues to haue intereſt. Thence went hee to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, viſited his ſonne in Daphne: who friendly welcommed

As Antiochus had cauſe to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: ſo had the Romans no great cauſe to be therefore ſorrie; otherwiſe than as they had much diſgraced themſelues, by diſcouery of their impotent malice, in chaſing him thus out of his Countrie. For it would not proue alike eaſie vnto this great Commander, to make ſtout Souldiours of baſe Aſiatiques; as it had been by his trayning and diſcipline, to make very ſeruiceable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Nations, that were hardie, though vnexperienced. Or were it ſuppoſed, that one mans worth, eſpecially being ſo extraordinary, could alter the nature of cowardly people: yet was it therewithall conſiderable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baſeneſſe of his Flatterers, and a thouſand other ſuch vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a deſolate and baniſhed man; than had bin the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in thoſe actions wherein he had the high Command, and was ſeconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victorie: or if it further ſerued to hearten Antiochus, and make him leſſe carefull to auoid the war; then ſhould it further ſerue, to iuſtifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it ſeemes indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is ſaid before, hauing newly ſent Embaſſadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that hee had any meaning to take Armes; vnleſſe by meere violence he were thereto enforced. Onely the Ætolians were greatly ſuſpected, as a turbulent people, deſirous of innouation, and therefore practiſing with this Great King; whom they wiſhed to ſee among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeaſe them; they had of late beene anſwered with gentle words by one of the ten Counſailours, That the Senate would grant them whatſoeuer with reaſon they ſhould aske. But this promiſe was too large, and vnaduiſed. For when their Embaſſadours came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them leaſt. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themſelues: otherwiſe than by ſpeaking ſuch words, as might haſten the Romanes out of Greece for very ſhame; who had no deſire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of warre with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leaue the Country. For the Ætolians were wont to vpbraid the reſt of the Greeks with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, ſaying, That theſe their Deliuerers had layd heauier fetters vpon them, than formerly they did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than thoſe of the Macedonian: likewiſe, That it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greekes their chaine, and tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cauſe of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romanes had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip made no delay, in accompliſhment of that which was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie, and the whole Countrie at peace, both with the Romanes, and within it ſelfe. As for Antiochus; Hee made it his daily ſuit, That the Peace betweene him and Rome, ſuch as it was, might bee confirmed, and ſtrengthened by a League of more aſſurance. Neuertheleſſe T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to ſeize vpon Greece, as ſoone as hee and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, Hee retained ſtill in his owne hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Townes, hee might the better withſtand the dangerous Inuaſion like to be made by Antiochus. Suteable vnto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the tenne Embaſſadours, that had beene ſent ouer to aſſiſt him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they ſaid, would queſtionleſſe fall vpon Greece: wherein he ſhould find not onely the Ætolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedamon, readie to giue him entertainement. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe ſomewhat againſt theſe their ſuſpected enemies: eſpecially againſt Nabis, who could worſt make reſiſtance; whileſt Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intentiue to his buſineſſe. Theſe reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the Vulgar; but found ſuch credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, againſt which time it was expected that Antiochus ſhould be readie to take his great enterpriſe in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African deſired, and obtained, a ſecond Conſulſhip, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, againſt the King and his Hannibal.

Hannibal. For the present, the businesse with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would bee a faire colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof also hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be sorry; though for his owne part, hee wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yeeres before this, as is already shewed, whilest he had warre with Philip: and had further beene contented for the Romans sake to be at peace with the Achæans; neither since that time had hee done any thing, whereby hee should draw vpon himselfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Achæans; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischiefe. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Cities; Which he caused to meet for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the warre with Philip, not only the Greekes, but the Romans themselues, had each their motiues apart (which hee there briefly rehearsed) that should stirre them vp, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in some sort maimed, or incompleat, whilest the noble City of Argos was left in subiection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duely to consider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argos a matter worthy to bee vndertaken; or whether otherwise to auoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leaue it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselues. The Athenian Embassador made answer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as hee could deuise. Hee gaue thankes to the Romans for what was past; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein vnrequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pitie it was to heare, such notable vertue & high deserts ill spoken of by some: which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imagination to foretell, what harme these their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankefulnesse rather would haue required an acknowledgement of the benefits and pleasures already receiued. Euery one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Ætolians. Wherefore Alexander the Ætolian rose vp, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their City had beene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recouery of the liberty generall: from which honor they were now so farre fallen, that they became Parasites vnto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would leade all the rest into seruitude. Then spake He against the Achæans, Clients that had beene a long time vnto the Macedonian; and souldiers of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These, He said, had gotten Corinth, and must now haue warre bee made for their sakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwaies beene friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus containe himselfe, but obiected vnto the Romans fraudulent dealing: forasmuch as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; hauing beene alwaies wont to professe, That Greece could neuer be at libertie, whilest those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesses wherewith to finde themselues occupied, that so they might haue some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Country? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carrie their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis; the Ætolians themselues did promise, & would vndertake, That they would either cause him to yeeld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submit himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. These words had beene reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common liberty wrought so much with these Ætolians; as did their owne rauenous desire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themselues, that worse would vse it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had had loſt. Neither could they well diſſemble this; making it no ſmall part of their grieuance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had beene couenanted, That the Romans ſhould enioy the ſpoyle of all, but leaue the Townes and Lands in poſſeſſion of the Ætolians. This, and the remembrance of a thouſand miſchiefes by them done in former times, made the whole aſſembly, eſpecially the Achæans, crie out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take ſuch order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Ætolian theeues bee enforced to keepe home, and leaue their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleaſure of Titus: who ſaw, that by diſcountenancing the Ætolians, He was become the more gracious with all the reſt. But whether it pleaſed him ſo well that Antiochus his Embaſſadors did preſently after lie hard vpon him, to draw the peace to ſome good concluſion, it may bee greatly doubted. He caſt them off with a ſlight anſwere: telling them, That the ten Embaſſadors or Counſailours which had beene ſent vnto him from Rome, to bee his aſſiſtants in theſe matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedæmonian warre; it was very ſoone ended. For Titus vſed the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation againſt Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if hee ſhould haue had to doe with Philip. Beſides the Romane forces, King Eumenes with a Nauie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were inuited to the ſeruice: as alſo Philip of Macedon ſent aid by Land; doing therein poorely, whether it were to get fauor of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in ſeeking reuenge vpon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the moſt forward in this Expedition were the Achæans, who ſet out ten thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe. As for the Ætolians: rather to hold good faſhion, and ſound their diſpoſitions, than in hope to ſpeed, their helpe was required; whereof they excuſed themſelues as well as they thought beſt. Thus are the Achæans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; hauing remooued the Ætolians from that degree of fauour: like as they themſelues hereafter (though not in all haſte) ſhall be ſupplanted of the ſame Lacedæmonians, againſt whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argiues more bold then wiſe, began a conſpiracie againſt the Lacedæmonians that held their Towne; meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neare, they were all detected and ſlaine: excepting a very few, that eſcaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, cauſed the Armie to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no ſtir within the Walles: the execution done vpon the firſt mouers, hauing terrified all the reſt of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to aſſaile Nabis in the head of his ſtrength at Lacedæmon, than to conſume time about other places; eſpecially at Argos: for the freedom whereof ſince the Warre was made, pitty it were, that the calamities of the warre ſhould thereon fall moſt heauily.

Nabis had in readineſſe an Army of fifteene thouſand, wherewith to defend himſelfe againſt theſe Inuaders. Fiue thouſand of them were Mercenaries: the reſt, of his owne Countrie; but ſuch as were of all others the worſt, as manumiſed ſlaues, malefactors and baſe peaſants, vnto whom his Tyrannie was beneficiall. Of the good and worthy Citizens he ſtood in doubt; and ſince he could not hope to win their loue, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Aſſembly: and compaſſing them round in with his Armie, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themſelues; they might, hee ſaid, hope the better to withſtand the common Enemie. But foraſmuch as turbulent heads were inuited by light occaſions, to raiſe tumults, and worke dangerous treaſon: it ſeemed vnto him the ſafeſt; and (withall) the mildeſt courſe, to arreſt beforehand, and put in ward, all thoſe whom he found moſt reaſon to ſuſpect. So ſhould he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preſerue not only the City and his owne perſon from danger, but them alſo for the puniſhment, which elſe they might haue incurred. Hereupon hee cites and apprehends about foureſcore of them; whom hee leades away to priſon, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was hee ſure that they neither ſhould offend, nor yet breake looſe. As for the death of them, if it ſhould happen to be noyſed abroad: what could it elſe doe than terrifie the people; who muſt thereby vnderſtand, that it was a mortall crime to bee ſuſpected? And to the ſame purpoſe his cruelty extended it ſelfe vnto some poore wretches: whom he accused of a meaning to flie to the Enemie. These were openly whipt through all the streets, and slaine. Hauing thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that came on apace. He welcommed them with a sallie: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode not many daies before Sparta: but ouer-ranne the Countrey; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleete at the same time with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, layd siege vnto Gytheum, the onely or principall Towne that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Gouernours within the Towne equall in authoritie: whereof the one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romanes. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, slue the Traitor; after whose death, hee himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Armie came thither to Gytheum: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the vttermost, and await what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to giue vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne-in-law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Gouernment with a thousand Souldiours Mercenaries, and two thousand Argiues: it being (as may seeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Gytheum: which hee thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to thinke vpon finishing the warre, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassadour to Titus: requesting onely that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speak with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe: prouing, that he suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments; whereof the summe was, That whatsoeuer they now did, or could obiect vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alleadged, they ought to make warre vpon him; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoeuer, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from entring into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith satisfied. He charged him with Tyrannie, and gaue instance, as easily he might, of diuers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, forasmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Inuasion should be alleadged. Wherfore he said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romanes: That hee had bargained to ioyne with Philip; when he was their enemie, not onely in League, but also in affinity: and that his Fleete had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracie, since in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom hee had long held warre: it may seeme to haue beene obiected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very friuolous. As for Messene, and the bargaine of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to haue beene mentioned. All this it seemes that Aristænus, the Prætor of the Achæans, verie well perceiued: who therfore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne iustice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbeaae to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had neuer done them wrong; framed this discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his own estate; and to settle his fortunes, whilest he might do it without hazzard: alleadging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and liued in great securitie, honour, and happinesse, as priuate men. Thus they discoursed vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to deliuer vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counsaile with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must bee, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making ſhort worke) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon ſuch Conditions as Titus ſhould thinke meete. Beſides the reſtitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and ſome of them very grieuous. Hee would not ſuffer the Lacedemonian to haue ought to doe in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies; nor warre, either in that Iland or elſewhere; not to build any Towne or Caſtle vpon his owne Lands; not to keepe any other ſhipping, than two ſmall Barkes; beſides many other troubleſome iniunctions; with impoſition of an hundred talents in ſiluer to be paid out of hand, and fiftie talents yeerely, for eight yeeres next enſuing. For obſeruance of theſe Couenants hee demanded fiue hoſtages, ſuch as he himſelfe ſhould name; and one of them to bee the Tyrants owne ſonne. If it had beene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the warre from Nabis, becauſe it was not grounded vpon iuſtice: then had it beene enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himſelfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp. But if it were thought reaſonable, to diſpenſe a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the ſtate of their beſt friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyrannie: then ſhould this enterpriſe, when once it was taken in hand, haue beene proſecuted vnto the very vtmoſt. As for this middle coruſe which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them, to entich themſelues by the ſpoyle of one that had not offended them: nor pleaſing to the Achæans, who iudged it euer after a great blemiſh to the noble acts of Titus: ſo did it miniſter vnto the Ætolians, and to ſuch as curiouſly pried into the faults of thoſe which tooke vpon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subiect of malicious diſcourſe. For ſince Philip, a King, and deſcended of many famous Kings, might not be ſuffered by theſe Maſterly Romans, to hold any one of thoſe Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Anceſtors: it was thought very ſtrange, that Lacedæmon, once the moſt famous Citie among all the Greekes, was by the ſame Romans left in poſſeſſion of a Tyrant, that had vſurped it but yeſterday: and Hee therein rooted by their authoritie, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other ſide thought himſelfe vnmercifully dealt withall, by the ſelfe-ſame Romans, whoſe amitie he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and affinitie of the Macedonian King, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But falſly had he dealt with the Macedonian: and falſly was hee dealt with by thoſe, to whom he did betake himſelfe. Among theſe Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleaſed him; ſaue onely that for the baniſhed Lacedemonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe; hauing among them Ageſipolis the naturall King of Sparta, that being a yong childe was driuen out by Lycurgus, the firſt of the Tyrants) there was made no prouiſion, to haue them reſtored vnto their Citie and Eſtates; but onely leaue required for as many of their wiues, as would be ſo contented, to liue abroad with them in baniſhment. Wherefore he forbore to giue conſent vnto theſe demands: and ſuſtained an aſſault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would ſoone be wearie. But his fearefull nature ſhortly ouercame the reſolution, which the ſenſe of theſe iniuries had put into him. So yeelding vnto all that had beene propounded, Hee deliuered the hoſtages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans farre more wicked than himſelfe; and was readie vpon the firſt aduantage, to doe them all the miſchiefe that he could.

The Argiues had heard newes that Lacedæmon was euen at point of being taken. This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to ſet vpon the Garriſon; which was much weakened, by the remooue of the three thouſand carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly ſhould ſet their hands to the getting of it; which no ſooner they did than they obtained it. Preſently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where hee was ioyfullie welcommed. Hee was deſeruedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laied hold without ſtaying for him: and that he might the better entitle himſelfe thereto, hee cauſed the libertie of the Argiues to be proclaimed at the Nemæan games, as ratifying it by his authority. The Citie was annexed againe to the Councell of Achaia; whereby the Achæans were not more ſtrengthened, than the Argiues themſelues were ſecured from danger of relapſe, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little businesse or none wherewith to set on worke his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace & friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed vnto quiet; Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not haue his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The vnsincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Ætolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Ætolians, and of throughly perswading all the Greekes (which was not to bee neglected, by those that meant to assure vnto themselues the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrie, was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leauing the Nation vnto it selfe, till occasion should be ripe, and call them ouer againe. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any neere distance appearing; hee called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where hee meant to bid them farewell. There hee recounted vnto them all that had passed since his comming into those parts; and willed them to value the Romane friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romanes found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsell; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to haue of liuing peaceably, and without faction. Lastly hee gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Achæans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to do the like (which very soon hee did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might bee knowne, what liers the Ætolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. With ioyfull acclamations did the Greekes testifie their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransome and enlarge all Romans, that had bin sold into their Countrie by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leauing the Countrie before his departure was vrged, left therein behinde him the memorie of his vertue and benefits, vntainted by ielousie & suspition of any euill meaning. At his comming to the Citie, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three daies together the shew of his pomp continued: as being set out with the spoyles of a Countrie, more aboundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romanes had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemie, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Siluer: some in the rude Masse vnwrought; some, in diuers sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of sundry kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workemanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Siluer; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteene Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Armie; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the Shew) the Roman Captiues, by his procurement redeemed from slauerie in Greece.

Not long after this Triumph; He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very fauourable answeres, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the ten that had bin his Counsailors; because their businesse was said to be somwhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said vnto Titus & his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either betweene the Victor and the vanquished; between those, that hauing warred together, were vpon equall termes of aduantage; or between those that had liued alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure the imposition of some Couenants, that else might seeme vnreasonable. Where Warre had beene made, and no aduantage gotten; there was it vsuall to demand and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could could agree. But betweene those which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to bee proposed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne; and neither carry it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in prescribing ought that might be troublesome. Now of this last kinde, was the league & friendship that had beene so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romanes. Which being so: they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insist on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to prescribe vnto the King, what Cities of Asia hee should set at libertie; from what Cities they would giue him leaue to exact his wonted Tributes; eyther putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintius answered, That since they went so distinctly to worke, He would also doe the like. Wherefore hee propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaue them their choyce whether to accept: Eyther that it should bee lawfull for the Romanes, to take part in Asia with any that would seeke their friendship; Or if King Antiochus misliked this, and would haue them forbeare to meddle in Asia, that then he should abandon whatsoeuer he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing, but no reasonable nor pertinent answere, to that which the Kings Embassadours had propounded. For if the Romanes might be hired to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affayres of Smyrna, Lampsacus, or any other Asiatiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, binde them in honour to make warre with a King that sought their loue, and had neuer done them iniury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Lysimachia, whereon of late he had beene at so much cost, in building it vp euen from the foundations, and repeopling it with inhabitants, that had all been dispersed, or captiue to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadors with great indignation alleadged: saying, that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romanes; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to set at liberty those Townes, which the King would oppresse and hold in subiection: especially since those Townes were of Greekish bloud and language; and fell in that regard vnder the patronage, which Rome had affoorded vnto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soon haue left Antiochus King of not many subiects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neyther did they forbeare to say, That, vnlesse hee would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied vpon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might bee vnderstood) with such as were his subiects. Wherefore they vrged his Embassadours to come to a point, and tell them plainely which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answere, which the Embassadours could not heereto make; little wanted of giuing presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselues to be entreated, and were contented once againe to send ouer P. Villius, and others that had been already with the King at Lysimachia; by whom they might receiue a finall answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two yeeres, or thereabours, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans all that while, no disposition to let him liue in peace.

§. V.

Of the long warres which the Romanes had with the Gaules, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Iniuries done by Masanissa to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romanes for iustice in vaine.

THe Insubrians, Boyans, and other of the Cisalpine Gauls, together with the Liguri-ans; made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italie, euen from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill such time as they themselues were vtterly subdued: which was not, before the Romanes were almost at the vey height of their Empire. These Nations, hauing serued vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards hauing gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath beene already shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, grew to be ſuch willing partakers each of others fortune, that ſeldome afterwards either the Gaules or Ligurians did ſtirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were readie to ſecond them. How the Romanes firſt preuailed, and got large poſſeſſions in Gallia Ciſalpina now called Lumbardie; it hath beene long ſince rehearſed, betweene the firſt and ſecond Punick Warres. As alſo it hath ſince appeared, how they loſt the greateſt part of their hold in that Countrie, by meanes of Hannibal his paſſage there-through. Neither is it likely that the re-conqueſt would haue beene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the firſt purchaſe: if, beſides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre had not been diſtracted by the Ligurians; that alwaies made them to proceed warily, hauing an eye to the danger at their backes. The Ligurians were a ſtout Nation, light and ſwift of bodie; well practiſed in laying ambuſhes, and not diſcouraged with any ouerthrow, but forthwith ready to fight againe. Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of ſtreight and dangerous paſſages. Few good Townes they had; but many Caſtles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: ſo as without much labour, they could neither bee taken nor beſieged. They were alſo very poore; and had little or nothing that might giue contentment, vnto a victorious Armie that ſhould ſpoyle their Land. In theſe reſpects, they ſerued excellently well, to traine vp the Roman Souldiers to hardneſſe and military patience: teaching them (beſides other exerciſes of warre) to endure much, and liue contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and ſpoyling the Territorie of their borderers, that were ſubiect vnto Rome. But their obſtinate continuance in the Warre which they had begun, ſeemes to haue bin grounded vpon the Condition of all Saluages; To be friends or foes, by cuſtome, rather than by Iudgement: and to acknowledge no ſuch vertue in Leagues, or formall concluſions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vſing their aduantage, or taking reuenge of iniuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or moſt of the Weſt-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reaſon of the Warres betweene them and any of their neighbours, doe vſe commonly this anſwere, It hath ſtill beene the cuſtome for vs and them, to fight one againſt the other.

Ch. 2. §. 8. of this booke.

Diuers ouerthrowes, though none that were great, theſe Ligurians gaue vnto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they receiued. Often they ſought peace, when they found themſelues in diſtreſſe; and brake it againe as often, when they thought it profitable ſo to doe. The beſt was, that as their Countrie was a good place of exerciſe vnto the Romans, ſo out of their owne Countrie they did little harme: not ſending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, becauſe they knew not how to make warre, ſaue on their owne ground.

The Countrey of Spaine, as it was the firſt part of the Continent out of Italie that became ſubiect vnto the Romans: ſo was it the laſt of all their Prouinces, which was wholly & throughly by them ſubdued. It is likened in figure by ſome Geographers vnto an Oxe-hide: and the Romans found in it the property of that Oxe-hide, which Calanus the Indian ſhewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any ſide of it, the further parts would riſe from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that thoſe parts from which the Roman Armies lay furtheſt, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardy Nation, and eaſily ſtirred vp to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted alſo (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themſelues: and being diuided into many ſmall Signiories, that had little other communion than of language, they ſeldome or neuer prouided in generall for the common good of their Countrie; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such priuate reſpects made them often to fall aſunder; when many had vnited themſelues together, for chacing out of the Romans. And theſe were the cauſes of their often ouerthrowes: as deſire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cauſe of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had beene accuſtomed, to make euacuation of this Chollericke Spaniſh humour; by employing as Mercenaries in their warres abroad, thoſe that were moſt likely to be vnquiet at home. They had alſo taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and vſed them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which they rayſed vpon the whole Countrie; as bing farre better husbands, and of more dexteritie than were the Romans, in that kinde. But contrariwiſe the Romanes, vſing the ſeruice of their owne Legions, and of their ſure friends the Latines, had little buſineſſe for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to haue much buſineſſe with them. Spaine waa too fat diſtant, and withal too great, for them to ſend ouer Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the courſe that they tooke in Italie. Wherefore it remained, that they ſhould alwaies maintaine ſuch Armies in the Countrie, as might ſerue to hold it in obedience perforce; and ſuch heedfull Captaines, as might be ſtill ready to oppoſe the Barbarians in their firſt Commotion. This they did: and thereby held the Countrie; though ſeldome in peace.

Very ſoone after the departure of Scipio, there was raiſed warre in Spaine againſt the Romans, euen vpon the ſame generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spaniſh Warres following. It was thought vnreaſonable, that the Spaniards ſhould one while helpe the Carthaginians againſt the Romanes, and another while the Romanes againſt the Carthaginians; baſely forgetting to helpe themſelues againſt thoſe that were ſtrangers, yet vſurped the Dominion ouer them. But the forces which Scipio had left behinde him in that Countrie, being well acquainted with the manner of Warre in thoſe parts, ſuppreſſed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with ſubiection, brought peace vpon the Countrie; which laſted fiue yeeres. This Victory of the Romanes, though it happily ended the Warre: yet left it ſtill remaining the cauſe of the Warre, which after fiue yeeres brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Romane Proconſul, whom they ſlew; and had a great Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happie ſucceſſe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to ſend thither to Prætors, and with each of them ſome two Legions. Theſe did ſomewhat: yet not ſo much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Conſul the yere following, and ſent into that Prouince, found at his comming little leſſe to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: ſome were faithfull to Rome; and ſome were idle beholders of the paines that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great victory vpon the chiefeſt of them; they roſe againſt him in many parts of the Countrey, and put him vnto much new trouble. Whileſt he was about to make a iournie againſt thoſe that were as yet vnſubdued: ſome of the lately vanquiſhed, were euen ready to rebell. Hee therefore diſarmed them: which they tooke ſo heauily, that many of them ſlew themſelues for very griefe. Hearing of this, and well vnderſtanding, that ſuch deſperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them: and commending vnto them peace and quietneſſe, which they neuer had diſturbed but vnto their owne great loſſe, He prayed them to deuiſe what courſe might be taken, for holding them aſſured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would giue counſaile in a matter of this nature. Hauing therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their inuention barren in this kinde of Subiect; Hee gaue expreſſe charge, That vpon a day appointed they ſhould throw downe the wals of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with ſingular induſtry finiſhed it in ſhort time. Neither thought he it any diſgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Armie of the Celtiberians, againſt other of their Countrimen: excuſing the indignitie, ſuch as it ſeemed, with a ieſt. That if he were vanquiſhed and ſlaine, then ſhould he neede to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, hee could pay them with the Enemies money. Finally, He brought the Warre to ſo good end, that in long time after, though Spaine were often troubleſome, yet was it in no danger of being loſt. He increaſed alſo the publike Reuenues in that Prouince, by cauſing ſome Mynes of Iron and Siluer to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Heerein hee did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar diſpoſition.

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed the Occupation of the Romans; but ſo well furniſhed with all other vſefull qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might ſeeme requiſite to the accompliſhment of a perfect man. He was very skilfull in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, & not vnprofitable in any buſineſſe either priuate or publike. Many books he wrote: whereof the principall were, of the Roman antiquities, & of husbandry. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he liued in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sinceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein he had merited singular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse rigid, and more gallant in behauiour. Otherwise, Hee was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that hee could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he were neuer out of his Element. He loued businesse so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that euen vnto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himselfe, or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore & sixe yeeres, He pleaded in his owne defence: and foure yeres after, he accused Sergius Galba vnto the People. So beganne the Nobility of Cato his family; which ended in his great grandchilde M. Cato the Vtican: one, that being of like vertue and feruencie, had all his good purposes dasht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and greatnesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrie, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrie seldome free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Romane Prætors therefore, of which two euery yeere were sent ouer Commanders into Spaine (that was diuided into Gouernments) did rarely faile of such worke, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One slew thirteene thousand Spaniards in a battell: another tooke fiftie Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrie to sue for Peace. Thus euery one of them, or most of them, did some laudable seruice; and yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes heereof I haue already pointed; and therefore thinke it enough to say, That the businesse in Spaine required not the imployment of a Romane Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed; vntill the Numantian Warre broke out, which was verie long after.

In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hanibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themselues & their obedient Citie: Masanissa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the lesser Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrie the Numidian challenged; and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. He had a great aduantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, without leaue obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redresse, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alleadge, if the Iudges had been vnpartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds had left them the possession of this Country: Masanissa himselfe, now very lately, pursuing a Rebell that fled out of his Kingdom, desired leaue of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise beene questionable) that the Country was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masanissa had wherewith to iustifie his proceedings, especially vnto the Romane Senate. Hee gaue the Fathers to vnderstand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill-affected to the State of Rome. There had lately beene sent vnto them from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined vpon some suspition of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his shippe, had thereby affoorded him meanes to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainely it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe.

As for the Countrie of Emporia: it had alwaies, hee said, beene theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime vnto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if truth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title vnto any more ground, than that whereon their Citie ſtood; or ſcarcely to ſo much. For they were no better than ſtrangers in Africk, that had gotten leaue there to build vpon ſo much ground, as they could encompaſſe with an Oxe-hide cut into ſmall thongs. Whatſoeuer they held without ſuch a compaſſe, was purchaſed by fraud, and wrongfull encrochments. This conſidered, Maſaniſſa requeſted of the Senate, That they would not adiudge vnto ſuch vſurpers, the Countrie ſometimes appertaining to the Anceſtors of him their aſſured friend. The Romans hauing heard theſe allegations on both ſides, found the matter ſo doubtfull, that they could not on the ſudden tell what to determine. Wherefore becauſe they would doe nothing raſhly; they ſent ouer three Embaſſadours, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuerſie: yet ſecretly giuing them inſtructions, to leaue all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embaſſadours followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Maſaniſſa with a ſtrong Army ſhould quickely preuaile, againſt thoſe that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime againſt the wrong. By ſuch Arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from ſtirring in fauour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any diſpoſition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their finall deſtruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leiſure to expreſſe the vtmoſt of their hatred.

§. VI.

The Ætolians labour to prouoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to warre vpon the Romans; by whom they hold themſelues wronged and diſgraced. Nabis beſiegeth Gyttheum, and waſteth ſome part of Achæa. The exact skill of Philopœmen, in aduantage of ground: whereby hee vtterly vanquiſheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied Peace by the Romanes, ioynes with the Ætolians. The Ætolians ſurprize Demetrias; and by killing Nabis, their Confederate, ſeize vpon Sparta. But they are driuen out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his perſwaſions annexe themſelues to the Achæans.

ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieued much the Ætolians to thinke, that they who had promiſed vnto themſelues the whole ſpoyle of Philip, and the higheſt reputation among the Greekes; were not onely diſappointed of their couetous hopes, but quite forſaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the moſt vnregarded. Yet was there made a great acceſſe to their Eſtate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had beene taken from the Macedonian. This might haue well ſufficed them, if their deſires had not beene immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their deſire. But they were not ſo pleaſed with that which they had, ſince they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themſelues to be wholly diſeſteemed, wherein they thought that they had vnſufferable wrong. Wherefore they deuiſed, in a Parliament which they ſhortly held, by what meanes they beſt might right themſelues; and giue the Romans a ſorrowfull knowledge of the difference, betweene their enmity and friendſhip. To this purpoſe they ſoone agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not onely perſwade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refuſed Peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemie, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to ioyne al together in a new Confederacy: whoſe ioynt forces could not in all likelihood but farre ſurmount thoſe of the Romans, Achæans Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterpriſe, which the Ætolians tooke in hand; and well beſeeming them, for they were great darers. They ſent Embaſſadours to all theſe Kings, with perſwaſions, as they thought, moſt forcible. But Philip was irreſolute; and Antiochus willing to try firſt all other courſes. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had loſt much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet ſhewed himſelfe of all other the moſt forward: and not ſtaying ſo much as to ſeeke any good pretence, beganne immediatly to lay ſiege vnto Gyttheum, that had beene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whoſe care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Peloponneſus, were not ſlow to admoniſh Nabis of his dutie: neither would they haue ſtaied long from repreſſing his violence by open Warre; had not ſome of them thought it wiſedome to aske counsaile of the Romanes, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselues in a businesse of such importance. Whilest thus they spent time in sending Embassadours, and were aduised by Quintius to let all alone, and to waite for the comming of the Romane forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them iuster cause of complaint, by wasting their owne Territorie.

Philopœmen was then Prætor of the Achæans, who had long been absent in Crete, making war there for his mindes sake and recreation. Vnto him the Achæans referred themselues, giuing him leaue to order the warre at his pleasure; either staying till the Romanes came, or doing otherwise, as he should thinke best. He made all haste to relieue Gytheum, by Sea; fearing lest the Towne, and the Achæan Garison within it, should be lost, if he vsed any delay. But Philopœmen was so bad a Sea-man, that hee knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. Hee made a Quadrireme Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yeeres agoe beene counted a gallant vessell, in the Nauie of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleete so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leakes, and tooke in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleete saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and saued themselues with what speed they could. But Philopœmen was not herewith danted. If hee had failed in Sea-seruice, which was none of his Occupation, He said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the siege of Gytheum, to stoppe the Achæans if they should inuade his Countrie. But vpon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopœmen came inexpected; fired their Camp; and put all, saue a very few of them, to the sword. Then marched hee with all his Armie towards Lacedæmon: within ten mile whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him that had already taken Gytheum. It was not expected that Nabis would haue beene readie for them so soone. Or if hee should come from Gytheum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee must ouertake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some fiue miles; hauing their Horse, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly vnderstood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to haue lodged. It was the custome of Philopœmen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his friends, to marke the situation of the Countrie about him; and to discourse, what might befall an Armie marching the same. He would suppose, That hauing with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and sorted in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were vpon that ground encountred by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would hee put the question, whether it were meet for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? what peece of ground it were meet for him to seize vpon? and in what manner he might best do it? in what sort he should order his men? where bestow his Carriages, and vnder what Gard? in what sort encampe himselfe? and which way march the day following? By such continuall meditation, Hee was growne so perfect, that hee did neuer meet with any difficultie, whence hee could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and hauing drawne vp his Rere, Hee encamped neere vnto the place where hee was; within halfe a mile of the Enemie. His baggage, withall thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his Souldiours. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke; whereto the Achæans lay the neerer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopœmen vnderstood this; and layd an ambush in place conuenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, hee caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitiue, and tell him, that the Achæans had a purpose to get betweene him and Lacedæmon; whereby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people to take Armes for the recouery of their freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would haue beene forced.

Some

Some Companies he made to stay behinde, and shew themselues vpon the Rampart, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philæmen was not so to be beguiled. He easily wonne the Campe, and gaue chace to Nabis: whose followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in couert all that day; Philopœmen conceiued aright, that their feare and necessitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and saue themselues, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Euening, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chace whilest it was day, He led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselues, and occupied the two most ordinary passages vnto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiuing in Philopœmens Campe great store of lights; thought that all had beene at rest: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirtie dayes together after this, did Philopœmen waste the Countrey round about, whilest Nabis durst not issue forth of his Towne; and then returned home, leauing the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be sollicited by the Ætolians. Very faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoeuer hee thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that he should receiue other fauours at their hands; and regaine possessions of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre against Antiochus in Greece, whilest their Embassadours that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yeelde vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage betweene Ptolemie and his daughter; together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings sonne, which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in person to the Embassadours; caused them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their answere as at their setting forth. One thing that might haue beene, and partly was, beneficiall vnto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Liuie rather thinkes) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a causelesse suspition wherein he held the Romans: that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadours; and that he, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had liued, Hannibal iudged the most worthy? So Hannibal gaue to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrhus the second: and the third he challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be so forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldest thou haue said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished mee? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I haue giuen the first place to Alexander, but haue claimed it as due vnto my selfe. Now whether this were so, or otherwise: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadours, made him suspected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbeare a while to vse his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceiued this change in the King: and plainely desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He easily recouered his former grace, and credit. For hee told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Altars, when he was a little boy, That he neuer should be friend vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine surmises: but to know thus much, That so long as hee thought vpon warre with Rome, so long would Hannibal doe him all good seruice: whereas contrariwise if he intended to make peace, then shoud it behooue him to vse the counsaile of some other man.

The Aetolians, and their friends, were no lesse busie all this while, in making their partie strong against the Romans, than were the Romans, in mustering vp their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vanting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselues the honour of the victory against Philip; that finally they pretailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of peace, vnlesse he would buy it at a deare rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian.

But

But in vaine. He vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improue their owne forces to the vttermost: as knowing, that all the burthen must lie vpon Antiochus and themselues, without helpe from any; saue onely from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus that animated them to resolution: the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neere at hand. For want of a ready answere hereto, they were contented to approue the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the businesse worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans: it would be no small piece of seruice, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the aduenture. Wherefore he came to their Panætolium, or great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serue to appease them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they tooke in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Countrie, the Romans, and King Anoiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Masterie: the Ætolians, as Masters in that kinde of Fence, setting them on, and becomming * the Sticklers. As for those grieuances which did thus exasperate them, and vrge them to such violent courses, Hee willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might doe to send Embassadours to Rome, that should either pleade their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to haue what they desired: than thus to set the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said, or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose helpe they had sought, waite so long for an answere, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtaine what they desired; either as their right, or else by way of fauour. For with such Termes had they beene feasted once already: and were by the Senate reiected vnto Titus: who, hauing it in his owne power, gaue them no satisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more adoe they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be entreated to come ouer into Greece, as well to set the Countrie at libertie, as also to decide the controuersies depending betweene the Romans and Ætolians. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderstood the Kings minde before. Hauing made it; they forgot no point of brauery, whereby to vaunt themselues to the Kings Embassadours, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to doe: but that this Decree, and their further answere, they would shortly let him know, if hee came to their campe in Italy vpon the riuer of Tibris. Gentler words would haue done better, as the Ætolians are like to vnderstand hereafter. But hauing thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the warre they referred vnto the more priuate Councel of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authoritie of a generall Assembly. The Apocleti (so were the Priuie Councell of Ætolia called) went as hotly to worke as any of the yongest heads could haue done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden; entring, some of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had beene driuen to flee thence, but was, by intercession of those that loued him, againe recalled. His Ætolian companions, that were not many, seized vpon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troupe which they had left not farre behinde them; and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discouered, and the Towne prepared to defend it selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answere, saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliuer the Towne from the Romans; who more insolently dominered ouer it, than euer the Macedonians had done. By which Rhethoricke they preuailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force.

force. For the Townes-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garriſon to keepe them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor receiued iniurie. So this buſineſſe was daſht. The attempt vpon Sparta was more ſtrange and deſperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Towne, ſtyling himſelfe King: but, more truely by all men called Tyrant. He had welneere loſt all, by meanes of the ouerthrow which Philopæmen had lately giuen him: ſince, he durſt not ſtirre abroad; and daily expected the miſchiefe, that on all ſides threatned him. Wherefore he ſent meſſengers, one after another, to the Ætolians; requeſting them, That as He had not beene ſlow to ſtirre in their behalfe, but aduentured himſelfe vpon the vtmoſt of danger, when all others were backward; ſo They would be pleaſed to ſend him what helpe they might, ſince his bad fortune had cauſed him preſently to neede it. It hath beene often ſaid, That the rauenous Ætolians were onely true to themſelues, and regarded neither faith nor friendſhip otherwiſe than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And ſo dealt they now. For ſince Nabis his mercenarie forces, which vpheld his Tyranny, were in a manner conſumed: they thought it expedient for their Eſtate, to put him out of the way; and, by ſo doing, to aſſure Lacedæmon vnto themſelues. To this purpoſe, they ſent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for ſuch a worke. To him they giue a thouſand Foot, and thirtie Horſe, choſen for the purpoſe. Theſe thirtie were by Damocritus the Prætor brought into the Councell of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiſer than they ſhould be, nor to thinke that they were ſent to make warre with the Achæans, or to doe ought elſe, ſaue onely what Alexamenus ſhould command them; which, were it neuer ſo deſperate, and in ſeeming againſt all reaſon; yet muſt they vnderſtand, that vnleſſe they performed it, they ſhould haue no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip: ſince the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would ſuffice to tread them downe. As for the Ætolians, He ſaid, that if neede ſhould ſo require, they would preſently ſend away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they could raiſe: But that they were very deſirous at the preſent, to make as goodly a muſter as they could before the great King; which cauſed them to ſend him thither afore with no greater companie. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had beene long pend vp in the Citie; and traine them without the wals: as if ſhortly he ſhould employ them in worke of conqueſt, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exerciſed his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horſe about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exerciſe, Alexamenus made it his faſhion to ſtep aſide alone to his Ætolians, and ſay ſomewhat as he thought fit: which done, he ſtill returned againe to Nabis. But when he ſaw time for the great worke that he had in hand: He then went aſide to his thirty Horſemen, and bade them remember the taske enioyned them at their ſetting foorth; telling them that they were all in caſe of baniſhed men, vnleſſe they would anone come vp to him, and helpe him to finiſh that which they ſhould ſee him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the ſudden, and ſtrucke him downe. The thirtie Ætolians neuer ſtood to deliberate vpon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any ſuccour could arriue, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Preſently vpon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ranne vnto the dead body: where in ſtead of ſeeking reuenge, they ſtood fooliſhly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætolians haſted into the Citie, and ſeized on the Palace: where he fell to ranſacking the Treaſure; and troubled himſelfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were diſperſed in the Towne, did alſo the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who ſeeing themſelues free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to ſee thoſe that had ſlaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was ſhortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall ſtocke, that had beene brought vp with Nabis his children; whom they mounted vpon a good Horſe, and made him their Chiefe. So they fell vpon the Ætolians that were idlely ſtragling about; and put them all to the ſword. Alexamenus with not many of his Company, were slaine in keeping the Citadell: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as bond-slaues. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopæmen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words vnto them, as Alexamenus should haue done after he had slaine the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne good and safetie, to incorporate themselues with the Achæans. Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians, and the small, but effectuall, trauaile of Philopæmen, the Achæans made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto bin gouerned either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselues Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth, whereof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled ouer all Greece.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended. Sundry passages betweene him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Euboea. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the Ciuill answere of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greekes to haue desired peace, betweene the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an idle vanitie, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal giues good counsaile in vaine. Some Townes wonne in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis; Where hee marrieth a young Wife, and reuels away the rest of Winter. Vpon the comming of the Roman Consul all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians keepes the Streights of Thermopyla. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leauing all in Greece vnto the Victors.

ANtiochus was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leaue them Enemies behinde him; and to winne them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was he desirous with all speede conuenient to shew himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a very small number, which bore hartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was already vp in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could haue done, were ready to conferre vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africk, there to molest the Romans, and so giue him the better leisure of vsing his owne opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Ætolian came ouer to him, and bad him lay all other care aside; for that his Countriemen had already taken Demetrias; a Towne of maine importance, that should giue him entertainment, whence he might proceede as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thoas was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to diuide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without neede of vsing violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more vnfit man to be employed in the Kings seruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the King should as greatly feele the losse of a Fleet or Armie, perishing vnder such a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuertheless if Hannibal preuailed; Hannibal alone should haue all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should be alwayes neere vnto the Kings person, to giue aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the soueraigne Command; euen of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being iealous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the aduancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought vpon.

Presently

Presently after this He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a fruolous pompe of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-side to Ilium; there to doe sacrifice to Minerua of Troy. Thence passing ouer the Aegean Sea, He came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian, the same whom the Aetolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they won Demetrias; was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countreymen, in great frequencie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a signe of good lucke, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of ioy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships; of which, no more than fortie were seruiceable for the Warres; with an Armie of ten thousand Foot, fiue hundred Horse, and sixe Elephants. The Aetolians no sooner heard of his comming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they inuited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would so doe; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his comming to Lamia, the Aetolians gaue him as ioyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he said, in true estimation a signe of his good will: in that he staid not to make all things ready; but hasted vnto their aide, euen whilest the season was vnfit for nauigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any charge, trauaile, or danger, to follow the businesse which he had vndertaken: euen to driue the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece; leauing the Countrey free indeede, and the Aetolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great: so was it his meaning, that all prouisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because hee would not be any way burdensome vnto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs entreat them, hauing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aide, vnprouided of many necessaries: that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he stood in neede. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vaine motion was made by some, that the differences betweene the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yeelde vnto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may obserue, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus in a businesse of dangerous importance, vpon the promised assurance of a State that is meerely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not preuailed in this Councell: the Aetolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of such gaine that might haue deceiued them; were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there beene, if this had so fallen out? He could haue bemoaned himselfe to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he must haue beene contented with this answere, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thoas would therefore haue pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proued much worse, both for him, and for the Aetolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirtie Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first vndertaken: whither if they came suddenly, they should not peraduenture neede to vse much force. The King had brought with him into Aetolia but a thousand Foot; leauing the rest behinde him at Demetrias. With these he hasted away directly toward Chalcis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Aetolians, which accompanied him thither. At his comming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Aetolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vsefull, they said would neuer be obtained; vntill by remouing the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euery seuerall Estate had where to finde redresse of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King

well able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans: who neuertheleſſe deſired them onely, ſo to ioyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans and Hee ſhould offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to ſeeke redreſſe at the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the ſame anſwere, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, but abſolute; for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whoſe good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they ſpake of themſelues, they could likewiſe affirme of all the Greekes: foraſmuch as none of them payed any Tribute; was kept vnder, by any Garriſon; or liued otherwiſe than by their owne Lawes, and without being tied vnto condition which diſpleaſed them. Wherefore they wondred, why the King ſhould thus trouble himſelfe, to deliuer Cities that were already free. But ſince hee, and the Ætolians, requeſted their friendſhip: they beſought both him, and the Ætolians, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leauing them in ſuch good caſe as they were. With this anſwere the King departed: for he was not, as then, ſtrong enough to force them. But very ſoone after, he brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yeelde: before all the ſuccours could arriue, which Titus had ſent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Eubœa being thus gotten; all the reſt of the Iland ſhortly yeelded to Antiochus. Foure or fiue hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer-late to haue defended Chalcis, repoſed themſelues at Delium, a little Towne of Bœotia, lying ouer againſt the Iland; where was a Temple and Groue, conſecrated vnto Apollo, that had the priuiledge of an inuiolable Sanctuary. In this place were ſome of them walking, and beholding the things there to be ſeene, whileſt others were buſied as they found cauſe: without feare of any danger; as being in ſuch a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himſelfe in many vaine Treaties of peace, tooke aduantage of their careleſneſſe, and vſed them with all extremitie of warre. Very few of them eſcaped: fiftie were taken; and the reſt ſlaine. Hereat Quintius was grieued: yet ſo, as it pleaſed him well to conſider, that his Romans had now more iuſt cauſe than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked well theſe beginnings, and ſent Embaſſadors into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation ſhould perſwade very many to take his part. The wiſer ſort returned ſuch anſwere, as the Calcidians had done. Some reſerued themſelues vntill he ſhould come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, He muſt hold them excuſed for not daring to ſtirre; or, if he came, the Romans muſt pardon their iuſt feare, in yeelding to the ſtronger. None of thoſe that lay farre off, ioyned with him in true meaning; ſaue the Eleans, that alwayes fauoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Achæans. Little reaſon there was, that he ſhould thinke to draw the Achæans to his partie. Neuertheleſſe he aſſayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the enuie, which Titus was ſaid to beare vnto Philopœmens vertue, had bred a ſecret diſlike betweene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Ætolians ſent Embaſſadours to the Councell at Ægium; that ſpared not braue words, if the Achæans would haue beene ſo taken. The Kings Embaſſadour told of great Armies and Fleets that were comming; reckoning vp the Dahans, Medians, Elimæans and Caduſians; names that were not euery day heard of, and therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydonians, Tyrians, Arabians, and Pamphylians were; ſuch indeede as could not be reſiſted. Now concerning money and all warlike furniture: it was, he ſaid, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Aſia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceiued: who conſidering the late warre made againſt Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue the like: the caſe was too farre different. Yet this moſt powerfull King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the vtmoſt parts of the Eaſt; requeſted no more of the Achæans, than that they would hold themſelues as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whileſt He tooke order with the Romans. To the ſame effect ſpake the Ætolian Embaſſador; and further added, That in the battell at Cynoſcephalæ, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both He and his Armie had beene there deſtroyed, had they not beene protected by vertue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was preſent at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit anſwere, as could haue beene deſired. He told the Achæans, That neither the Kings Embaſſadour, nor the Ætolian, did ſo greatly labour to perſwade thoſe vnto whom they addreſſed addressed their Orations; as to vaunt themselues the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discerne, what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus linked the King and the Ætolians together. For euen such bragges as here they made, before the Achæans who knew them to be lyers, had the Ætolians also made vnto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victory ouer Philip to be merely their Act: and the whole Countrey of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they beene feasted by the King, with such tales as his Embassadour told euen now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimæans, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians; such as were wont to be sold about for bondslaues, and good for little else. These diuers names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diuersitie of Venison, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no such vanter as were these Embassadours) had sometime feasted him. For all that varietie, whereat he wondred, was none other, as his Host then merrily tolde him; than so many pieces of one tame swine, drest after seuerall fashions with varietie of sawces. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pompe: it were good to make iudgement of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than tenne thousand men about him: for which little Armie hee was faine in a manner, to begge victuals of the Ætolians; and take vp money at vsurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ranne vp and downe the Countrey; from Demetrias to Lamia, thence backe to Chalcis, and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lyes: wherewith since both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilest wiser men tooke heede by their example. To a fauourable Auditory much perswasion is needlesse. The Achæans did not loue so well the Ætolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abiects. Wherefore they stood not to harken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed warre against him, and against the Ætolians.

How the hatred betweene these two Nations grew inueterate; sufficiently appeares in the storie foregoing. Now haue they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans, the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them vnwisely: though farre the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Ætolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrie at rest: there was nothing more greatly to haue beene desired, than that they might neuer finde occasion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to haue sought, not how Smyrna and Lampsacus might recouer their liberty (which had neuer beene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, diuided and kept asunder by their Countrie, as two Seas by an Isthmus or necke of land, might be kept from ouerflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiatiques, which originally were Greekish; than the generall applause, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of feare, that should moue them to take armes euen in their owne defence. But if all Greece would haue made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising ioyntly to assist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoeuer King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell beene at an end; but the Roman Patronage ouer the Countrey, had beene farre from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achæans were at this time, in a manner, the onely Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselues altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gaue doubtfull answers of hope vnto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselues his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Bœotians willingly receiued him, as soone as he entered vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had beene somewhat hardly vsed. Aminander the Athamanian, besides his old friendship with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himselfe to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sister to the poore Court of Athamania: where hauing made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was iudged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleeue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behoued him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of seruice done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get loue of the Macedonians that should be his subiects, or whether from some vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harme to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynoscephalæ, there to gather vp the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburied. The Macedons troubled not themselues to thinke on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit all: but King Philip tooke it in high indignation; as intended meerely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans, and gaue them to vnderstand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them wherein they should be pleased to vse him.

The Ætolians, Magnetians, Eubœans, Bœotians, and Athamanians, hauing now all ioyned with him; Antiochus tooke counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to inuade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another: confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alleadge, as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long beene cast aside, as a vessel of no vse; but was now required to deliuer his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now vtter, was euen the same which he would haue spoken, had his counsaile at any time before beene asked since their comming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Bœotians, and other their good friends, which now so willingly tooke their parts: what were they else than so many poore Estates, that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselues for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alleadging the same feare for their excuse? Wherefore he thought most behouefull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie: who (besides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards haue power to recoyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince, and one that had meanes to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to ioyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a very strong Argument: though indeede what neede was there, of prouing by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, said Hee, These Ætolians here present; and namely, this Thoas, being lately Embassadour from them into Asia, among other Motiues which he then vsed to excite the King vnto this Expedition, insisted mainely on the same point. He told vs that Philip was moued beyond all patience, with the Lordly insolence of the Romans: likening that King to some wilde beast, that was chained or lockt vp within some grate, and would faine breake loose. If this be so: let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, that he may regaine his libertie, and satisfie his angry stomacke, vpon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it proue otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoue vs to looke vnto him; that he may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending vs. Your sonne Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Armie: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage, let Seleucus be in readinesse, to fall vpon Macedon, and finde him worke to defend his owne on the other side, without putting vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip; and the present warre in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterprise, wherein now you are embarqued against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: Whereto had you then giuen eare, the Romans by this time should haue heard other newes, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become yours. Italie & Gaule should haue been on fire with warre, and little to their comfort, they should haue vnderstood, that Hannibal was againe come into Italie. Neither doe I see what should hinder vs euen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet & Armie hither (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, loaden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we haue here too few hands, and too many mouthes.) Wherefore let the one halfe be employed against Italie; whileſt you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were euen ready to follow vs into Italie: yea, and be ready to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my aduice; who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of warre; yet how to war with the Romans, I haue been instructed by long experience, both to their coſt and mine owne. Of this counsaile which I giue, I promiſe you my faithfull and diligent ſeruice for the execution: but what counsaile ſoeuer you please to follow, I wiſh it may be proſperous. Many were pleaſed with the great ſpirit of the man, and ſaid he had ſpoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; ſaue onely that one was ſent into Aſia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Theſſalie; about which they had before diſputed. There when they had won one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne ſtrength, were glad to make ſubmiſſion. But Lariſſa, that was chiefe of the Countrey, ſtood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the wals with his whole Armie. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Bœbius, a Roman Proprætor did ſend helpe thither. Likewiſe Philip of Macedon profeſſed himſelfe Enemy vnto Antiochus; whereby the fame of the ſuccour comming to Lariſſa, grew ſuch, as wrought more than the ſuccour could haue done, had it arriued. For Antiochus perceiuing many fires on the Mountaines toppes afarre off; thought that a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had beene comming vpon him. Therefore excuſing himſelfe by the time of the yeere; He brake vp his ſiege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne; whom, without regard of the much diſproportion that was betweene them, both in yeeres and fortune, He ſhortly married; and ſo ſpent the Winter following, as delightfully as hee could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the ſouldiors as readily imitated their Captains: in ſuch wiſe that when he tooke the field, he might euidently perceiue in what looſe manner of diſcipline his Armie had paſſed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Conſul, ſhall meet him very ſhortly, and helpe him to reclaime them from this looſeneſſe of nuptiall Reuels; by ſetting them to harder exerciſe.

M. Acilius was choſen Conſul with P. Cornelius Scipio Naſica. The war againſt Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwiſe Hee was no way ſo honourable, as Naſica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of far leſſe credit and importance. Naſica, beſides the great Nobility of his Family, had been long ſince, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The beſt man in Rome: when the Senate, for very feare and ſuperſtition, durſt not haue ſo pronounced him, had they not ſo thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the very beſt, ſhould entertaine an old ſtone, which the Diuell then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prærogatiue of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue ſuch aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Prouince; or arrogate more vnto himſelfe, than his lot ſhould affoord him. This vnpartiall diſtribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make warre againſt the Boïans; wherein hee purchaſed the honour of a Triumph, nothing ſo glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchaſed with harder ſeruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of war. But M. Acilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thouſand Foot, two thouſand Horſe, & fifteene Elephants. Ptolemie King of Ægypt, notwithſtanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus; and Philip King of Macedon; had lately ſent Embaſſadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in perſon with all his forces into Ætolia, there to aſſiſt the Conſul in this warre. Ptolemie ſent alſo gold and ſiluer, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earneſt. But he was too yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his mony was returned vnto him with thankes; and his louing offer as louingly refuſed. Vnto Philips Embaſſadours anſwere was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themſelues beholding to him, for the aſſiſtance that Hee ſhould giue to Acilius the Consul. Massanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did striue, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece. And herein Masanissa farre out-went the poore Citie of Carthage; as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul fiue hundred Horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians vndertooke to set out a Fleet at their owne charges: and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-mony, which was behinde, and ought to be discharged by many yeerely pensions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeeme themselues out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receiue the price of it.

The hastie and ridiculous issue of this war, that began with such noyse and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betweene the Roman and the Asiatick souldior. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same manner as he had preuailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terrour, that was like to proue their excuse, when they should againe forsake him. But King Philip and Bæbius, hauing recouered many places; and the Roman Consul being arriued, against whom none made resistance; Hee was glad to withdraw himselfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enioyed; as in recompence of his good seruice to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Aminandrs wife, was taken by the Consul,; made a mocking stocke, and sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians vsed much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yeelding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gaue vp themselues: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne liues, and departing vnarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them stayed behinde, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplexe Antiochus; who hauing withdrawne himselfe to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his friends: and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toyle during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of neede, Hee found all the promises of the Ætolians meerely verball: and himselfe reduced into tearmes of great extremitie. He therefore admired Hannibal as a wise man, yea a very Prophet, that had fore-seene all this long before. Neuertheless He sent word to the Ætolians, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their own neede to be no lesse than his. But the Ætolians had cause to think, that they themselues were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who hauing promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill vp the same ten thousand which he first brought ouer. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which ioyned with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, then that Thoas and his fellowes had done their best, in vaine, to haue made all the Nation take armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appeare in this time of danger: Hee seized vpon the Streights of Thermopyla; as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntill more helpe should come.

*l.3.c.6.§.3. Of the Streights of Thermopyla there hath beene spoken enough * before, vpon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceiued, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessalie, were vnable to passe that Ledge of Mountaines, diuiding the one halfe of Greece; vnlesse they could winne this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betweene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this passage two or three dayes together, against a World of men comming to inuade the Countrey. The latter, hauing taken vpon him to doe great miracles, and effect what he listed himselfe in Greece: did commit himselfe vnto the safetie of this place, when he was charged by not many more than hee had in his owne Armie. There whilest he lay, He sent earnest messengers one after another to the Ætolians, entreating them not to forsake him thus; but at least wise now to helpe, and keepe the toppes of the Mountaines, lest the Romans finding any by-path, should come downe vpon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thousand, that vndertooke to make good the few passages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort, prepared to force the the Streights, without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sickenesse from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them beene Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to try whether by any meanes they could get vp to the Ætolians. He himselfe encouraged his Armie: not onely by telling them, with what base conditioned enemies they had to deale: but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a sore iourney (for what happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, saue onely that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp steepie Rocks and crooked wayes; He commanded them to repose themselues; whilest Hee, being a very able man of body, tooke in hand the discouery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeede it was, the beast way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men, and held on the same path till toward breake of day. It was a place not hanted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopyla beene so often the Seat of Warre, as might cause any trauailers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there vntill day-light: by which hee discouered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him; and some of the Ætolians very neer vnto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a lustie Crue of his men, whom he thought fittest for that seruice; and willed them by any meanes to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and hee thereby vnderstood, that these Ætolians were no more than sixe hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So hee presently set vpon the Ætolians; ouerthrew them; slue a great part of them; and chaced the rest, that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was already begun betweene the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driuen them into their Campe, found it in a manner a desperate peece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe; which occupied the whole bredth of the Streights; was notably fortified; and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of seruice; but by Archers and slingers that were placed ouer them on the Hill-side, and powred downe a showre of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approch determined the matter. It was thought at first that the Ætolians had beene comming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Romane armes and ensignes were discouered, such was the terrour, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsooke the Campe, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badnesse of the way did hinder the Romane Army from making pursuit. Yet this dayes losse draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselues vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recouered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætolians onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neither did the Consul giue them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis He met with King Philip, that hauing recouered health, came to ioyne with him against Antiochus: ouer whom since the victory was already gotten, Hee did gratulate vnto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who faine would haue gotten Lamia before the Consul should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that vsed to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindered by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen ready to be taken, when the Consul, hauing won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoyle of these Towns was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopyla. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriuing by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himselfe: vntill such time as another Consul was ready to ease him of his charge.

The losse of Heraclea did so affright the Aetolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent vnto King Antiochus presently after his flight: entreating him not to forsake them vtterly, but either to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing withheld him from comming in person, at least wise to helpe them with money and other aide. They prayed him to consider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour, but appertained vnto his owne safetie: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Aetolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backes, might set vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this; and found their words true. Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicander, one of their Embassadours, a summe of money, that might serue to defray the charges of the Warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aide, both by Land and Sea. Thoas, another of their Embassadours, Hee retained with him: who willingly stayed, that he might vrge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them: then did the Aetolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suite vnto the Consull to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to giue them audience, but said He had other businesse in hand; onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would haue deliuered vnto himselfe. At their comming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their owne cause, to alleadge how well they had deserued of the Romans, Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of all such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euen betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselues vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadours to the Consul. This phrase of committing vnto the faith, signified, in their vse of it, little else, than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense, and counted them all one, as * yeelding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speake in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said Hee, I command you first of all, That none of yee presume to goe into Asia, vpon any businesse priuate or publike: then, That yee deliuer vp vnto me Dicearchus the Aetolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countrimen as haue followed him in reuolting from vs. Whilest he was yet speaking: Phaneas the Embassadour interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custome of the Greekes, who had yeelded themselues vnto his faith; not vnto slauerie. what? (said the Consul) Doe ye stand to plead Custome with me, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought, and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto euery one of their neckes. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadours; though since, their Condition was altered. Phaneas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apocleti or ordinarie Councel of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions, without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause He entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce for so long.

This surceasance of warre, during ten and other ten dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had beene commanded away from Lamia, that else he might haue wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that King, and to the end that he might not returne home with his Armie, like one that could not be trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further neede of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was desired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other petrie Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busie with the Aetolians; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all Athamania, Perrhebia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Aetolians, hearing what had befalne their Embassadours, were so enraged, That although they were very ill prouided for Warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that that Nicander about the same time was come backe from Antiochus, with mony and hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea, and Philip hauing lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being farre gone thence. His monie Nicander conueighed into Lamia, by very vnusuall deuices. But he himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Aetolians, there to make report of his Embassage; was very much perplexed about this his iourney, which lay betweene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet he made the aduenture: and keeping as farre as they could from the Roman side, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians, by whom he was taken, and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but either to be deliuered vnto the Romans, or vsed ill enough by Philip. But it seemes, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For He commanded his seruants to entreat Nicander friendly: and he himselfe being then at supper, did visit him as soone as he rose vp: giuing him to vnderstand; That the Aetolians did now reape the fruits of their owne madnesse; forasmuch as they could neuer hold themselues contented, but would needes be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselues well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus; but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to haue regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had neuer made any triall: for surely their good affection, one vnto the other, would be much more auaileable vnto each of them; than their mutuall catching of aduantages; whereby they had wrought themselues much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to signifie vnto his Countrimen; and priuately to hold in minde the courtesie which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giuing him a Conuoy to gard him to Hypata; He louingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicander was alwaies after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon: so as in the war of Perseus he made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans, and therfore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul vnderstood, that the Aetolians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it: hee foorthwith meant to prosecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither hee therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceiued it: for it was a strong Citie, and well manned. But Acilius stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should haue beene a loser, by rising from before it without Victory. So He staid there well neere all the following time of his Consulship; whilest the Macedonian King and the Achaans made farre better vse of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had reuolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hastie course of Victory, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Achaans called to accompt the Eleans and Messenians: which had long beene addicted to the Aetolian side, and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good words; whereby they saued themselues from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more stout, before they were inuaded; had none other helpe when the Achaan Prætor wasted their Countrey, than to offer themselues vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Achaans it was not their meaning to yeelde. A message from Titus to the Achaan Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Command of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annexe themselues vnto the Achaans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Maiestie of a Roman Embassador. Titus did fauour the Achaans; yet could not like it well, that either they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselues great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans vpon euen termes; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus which had once beene Philips, and was afterward giuen by him to Aminander who sent a Gouernor thither. But when Aminander in this present Warre, was driuen out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Gouernour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Iland to the Achaans; whom hee found ready Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootleſſe to diſpute. Wherefore the Achæans referred themſelues vnto his diſcretion. So hee told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tortoyſe, whereof Peloponneſus was the ſhell: and that holding themſelues within that compaſſe, they were out of danger; but if they would needs bee looking abroad, they ſhould lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Hauing ſetled things thus in Peloponneſus, Hee went ouer to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Conſul had laine two moneths, that might haue beene farre better ſpent. There, whether out of compaſſion which hee had vpon the Ætolians, or out of diſlike of King Philips thriuing ſo faſt: He perſwaded the Conſul to grant vnto the beſieged, and to the whole Nation, ſo long Truce, that they might ſend Embaſſadors to Rome; and ſubmitting themſelues, craue pardon of the Senate. Moſt like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: elſe would not the Ætolians haue made ſuch earneſt ſuit as they did vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabrio had beene ſure to carrie it, in any ſhort ſpace: it may well be thought hee would not haue gone away without it; ſince the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would haue made the promiſed ſubmiſſion much more humble and ſincere. When they came vnto Rome, no entreaty could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of theſe two; That either they ſhould wholly permit themſelues to the good pleaſure of the Senate; Or elſe pay a thouſand Talents, and make neither Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans ſhould giue approbation. They had not ſo much mony: neither could they wel hope to bee gently dealt withall, if they ſhould giue themſelues away vnto diſcretion; which what it ſignified, they now vnderſtood. Wherefore they deſired to haue it ſet downe, in what points, and how farre forth, they ſhould yeeld vnto the good pleaſure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certaine anſwere: ſo that they were diſmiſſed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whileſt the Ætolians were purſuing their hopes of peace, the Conſull had little to doe in Greece; and therefore tooke vpon him grauely to ſet things in order among the tractable Achæans. Hee would haue had them to reſtore the baniſhed Lacedæmonians home into their Countrie; and to take the Eleans into the fellowſhip of their Common-wealth. This the Achæans liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romanes ſhould be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the reſtitution of the baniſhed Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their owne meere grace. As for the Eleans: they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to diſparage the Achæans: into whoſe Corporation they were deſirous to be admitted, and ſaw that they ſhould haue their deſire, without ſuch compulſiue mediation.

The Romane Admirall C. Livius, much about the ſame time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought helpe to the Romans, though it was not great: and fiue and twenty ſaile of Rhodians came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of ſaile: but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquiſhed in fight, was yet out of danger; as ſoone as he betooke himſelfe to a ſpeedie retrait.

And ſuch end had the firſt yeeres warre, betweene King Antiochus and the Romanes. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the Ætolians, were glad to excuſe themſelues by feare; thinking themſelues happy when by Embaſſadours they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie ſide, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now ſend to gratulate this their Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had reſtored vnto him Demetrius his yonger ſonne; whom ſome few yeeres they had kept as an hoſtage. Alſo King Ptolemy of Ægypt, gratulating the Roman Victorie, ſent word how greatly all Aſia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard Hee deſired the Senate not to foreſlow time; but to ſend an Armie, as ſoone as might be, into Aſia: promiſing, that his aſſiſtance, wherein ſoeuer it pleaſed them to vſe it, ſhould not bee wanting. This Ptolemie was the ſonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the friend of Fortune. He vnderſtood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to haue the vpper hand. The ſame did Antiochus now begin to ſuſpect, who had thought himſelfe a while as ſafe at Epheſus, as if he had bin in another world: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not ſo far out of Greece into Aſia, as out of Italie into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would ſoon be there, and make him try the chance of a battell for his Kingdome.

Lucius Scipio, hauing with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lieutenant, is ſent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Ætolians, that ſo hee might at leiſure paſſe into Aſia. Much troubleſome buſineſſe by Sea; and diuers fights. An inuaſion vpon Eumenes his Kingdome; with the ſiege of Pergamus, rayſed by an handfull of the Achæans. L. Scipio the Conſul comes into Aſia: where Antiochus moſt earneſtly deſireth peace, and is denied it. The battaile of Magneſia: wherein Antiochus being vanquiſhed, yeeldeth to the Romanes good pleaſure. The Conditions of the peace. In what ſort the Romanes vſed their Victorie. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a moſt ſumptuous triumph ouer Antiochus, is ſurnamed The Aſiatique, as his brother was ſtiled The African.

LVcius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was choſen Conſul at Rome with C. Lælius. Lælius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being deſirous (as generally all Conſuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be ſo pleaſed, the diſpoſition of their Prouinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lotterie. Lucius hauing talked with his brother Publius, approued well of the motion. Such a queſtion had not of long time been put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more deſirous to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter beeing otherwiſe ſomewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African ſaid openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre againſt Antiochus, He himſelfe would follow his brother in that war, as his Lieutenant. Theſe words were heard with ſuch approbation, that the controuerſie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied vpon Hannibal, & ſhould happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppoſe, than Scipio; that had beene victorious againſt that ſame Great Worthy? But indeed a worſer man might haue ſerued well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no abſolute Command, nor ſearce any truſt of great importance: excepting now and then in conſultation; where his wiſedome was much approued, but his libertie and high ſpirit as much diſliked. It is worthy of remembrance; as a ſigne of the freedome that he vſed in his cenſures, euen whileſt hee liued in ſuch a Court. Antiochus muſtered his Armie in preſence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may ſeeme, to haue made him wiſh, that he had beene ſerued by ſuch braue men in Italie. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horſes, and Elephants, with ſuch coſtly furniture of Gold, Siluer, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauery on a Sun-ſhine day. Whereupon the King, well pleaſing himſelfe with that goodly ſpectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romanes. Enough (ſaid Hannibal) were the Romanes the moſt couetous men in all the world: meaning, that all this Coſt vpon the backes of Cowardly Aſiatiques, was no better than a ſpoyle to animate good Souldiers. How little this anſwere pleaſed the King, it is eaſie to gheſſe. The little vſe that he made of this Carthaginian, teſtifies that his diſlike of the man, cauſed him to loſe the vſe of his ſeruice, when he ſtood in greateſt neceſſitie thereof.

The Scipio's made all haſte away from Rome as ſoone as they could. They carried with them, beſides other Souldiers newly preſt to the warre, about fiue thouſant Voluntaries, that had ſerued vnder P. Africanus. There was alſo a Fleet of thirty Quinquereme Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Æmilius Regillus, that was choſen Admirall the ſame yeere for that voyage. At their comming into Greece, they found the old Conſul Glabrio beſieging Amphyſſa a Citie of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the paſſages thereto leading; which heedleſſely, as in a time of confuſion, they had left vnregarded the laſt yeere. Glabrio knowing this, deceiued their expectation, and fell vpon Lamia: which being not long ſince much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the ſudden; was carried at the ſecond aſſault. Thence went He to Amphyſſa: which he had almoſt gotten; when L. Scipio, his ſucceſſor, came with thirteene thouſand Foot, and fiue hundred Horſe, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphyſſa was preſently forſaken by the inhabitants, but they had a Caſtle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embaſſadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Ætolians:

lians: entreating him to ſtand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining ſome tollerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words: and willed them to perſwade the Ætolians, that they ſhould faithfully and with true meaning deſire it. This was gladly taken. But many meſſages paſſing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Conſul made ſtill the ſame anſwere, with which they had been chaced from Rome. The concluſion was, That they ſhould ſue for a longer time of reſpite from warre: whereby at more leiſure they might attend ſome better diſpoſition of the Senate; or any helpefull commoditie which time ſhould afford. So they obtained halfe a yeeres truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another halfe yeeres leiſure of breathing. Heereof were they not more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time loſt, which with-held the Warre from paſſing ouer into Aſia.

The buſineſſe of Ætolia being thus laide aſide: and the old Conſul Glabrio ſent home into Italie: the Scipio's marched into Theſſalie; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon & Thrace vnto the Helleſpont. Yet they conſidered, That hereby they muſt commit themſelues vnto the loyaltie of King Philip: who might either doe them ſome miſchiefe by the way, if he were diſpoſed to watch a notable aduantage: or at the leaſt, would be vnfaithfull; though he were not ſo couragious, yet might hee take ſuch order with the Thracians, that euen for want of victualls, if by no greater inconuenience, they ſhould be diſgracefully forced to returne. Hee had promiſed them the vtmoſt of his furtherance: wherein, whether hee meant ſincerely, they thought to make ſome triall; by cauſing a Gentleman to ride Poſt vnto him, and obſerue his doings as he ſhould take them on the ſudden. The King was merry at a feaſt, and drinking, when the Meſſenger came: whom he louingly bade welcome; and ſhewed him the next day, not only what prouiſion of victualls he had made for the Armie, but how he had made bridges ouer the riuers, and mended the badde wayes by which they were to paſſe. With theſe good newes Gracchus returned backe in haſte vnto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon, found all things in a readineſſe, that might helpe to aduance their iourny. The King entertained them royally; and brought them on their way, euen to the Helleſpont: where they ſtayed a good while, vntill their Nauie was in readineſſe to tranſport them into Aſia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the moſt part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a baniſhed Rhodian: true to the King; and deſirous of reuenge vpon his Countreymen that had expelled him. Hee, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes hauing not as yet put to Sea; thought to doe ſomewhat vpon thoſe that were ſo early in their diligence, before their followers ſhould arriue to helpe them. Yet went he craftily to worke; and ſent word, as in great ſecrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the ſentence of his baniſhment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleete. After many paſſages to and fro, this was beleeued: and the Rhodian Admirall grew ſo careleſſe, expecting ſtill when he ſhould receiue a watch-word from Polyxenidas, that hee himſelfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Hauen. The Kings Fleete ſet foorth from Epheſus by night; and, for feare of being diſcouered, reſting one day in a harbour by the way; came the ſecond night to Samos: where, by morning, it was ready to enter the Hauen. Panſiſtratus the Rhodian Admirall ſeeing this, thought it his beſt way of reſiſtance, to beſtow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Hauen; ſo to guard the mouth of it: for that he ſaw no likelihood of defending himſelfe by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed ſome Companies, in another part of the Iland: which falling vpon the backe of Panſiſtratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men abroord. This could not be without great confuſion: ſo as the enemies tooke him out of all order; and ſunke or boorded all his Nauie, fiue excepted, that by a ſudden deuice made ſhift to eſcape. Each of them hung out a burning Creſſet vpon two poles, at the Beake-head: and then rowed forwards directly vpon the Enemie: who hauing not bethought himſelfe what ſhift to make againſt ſuch vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way vnto theſe deſperate Gallies; for feare leſt they ſhould burne, together with themſelues, a part of the Kings Fleete.

Not long after this, the Romans had ſome loſſe by tempeſt: wherof Polyxenidas could not take ſuch aduantage as hee had hoped; becauſe, putting to Sea for that purpoſe, Hee was driuen backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to ſhew that they

they were not discouraged, set forth twentie other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumenes repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great brauerie, presented battaile to Polyxenidas before the Hauen of Ephesus. When hee durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as eyther they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by stormes at Sea; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to forsake them; and returne home to the defence of his owne Kingdome. For Antiochus wasted all the grounds about Elea & Pergamus: and leauing his sonne Seleucus to besiege the royall Citie of Pergamus: did with the rest of his Armie spoyle the whole Countrey thereabout. Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; hauing with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore he had reason to stand in feare, being too much inferiour in number. There came to his aid a thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Achæans: old souldiers all, and trayned vp vnder Philopœmen, whose Scholler, in the Art of warre, Diophanes their Commander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walls of Pergamus, which was an high Towne, the demeanour of the Enemie; began to disdain that such men as they should hold them besieged. For Seleucus his Armie which was encamped at the hill-foot, seeing that none durst sallie forth vpon them, grew so careless: as otherwise, than by spoyling all behinde their backes, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrie. Diophanes therfore spake with Attalus: and told them that he would goe foorth, encamped not farre from the Enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers; they wondred at first what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himselfe quiet, they made a iest of his boldnesse; and laughed to see with what an handfull of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned vnto their former negligence and disorders. Which Diophanes perceiuing, He commanded all his men to follow him, euen as fast as they well might: and he himselfe, with the hundred Horse, brake out on the sudden vpon the Station that was next at hand. Very few of the enemies had their Horses readie saddled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to make resistance: so as He draue them all out of their Campe; and chased them as farre as he might safely aduenture, with great slaughter of them, and no losse of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had couered the wals of the Towne, men and women, to behold this spectacle) were very ioyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of these Achæans. Yet would they not therefore issue forth of their gates, to helpe the Achæans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleucus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than he had done before: and against him went foorth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested a while in his old Station. When they had staied many houres, looking who should begin: Seleucus, in faire order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moued not whilest the Enemie was in sight: but as soone as the ground betweene them hindred the prospect, hee followed them in all haste, and soone ouertaking them with his Horse, charged them in Rere; so as he brake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heeles, to their very Trenches. This boldnesse of the Achæans, and the basenesse of his owne men, caused Seleucus to quit the siege, little to this honour. Such being the qualitie of these Asiatiques; Philopœmen had cause to tell the Romans, That he enuied their victorie. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis after his mariage, and his souldiors betooke themselues to Riot, as it had beene in a time of great security: a good man of warre might haue cut all their throates, euen as they were tipling in their victualling houses; which Philopœmen said that he would haue done, had He beene Generall of the Achæans, and not, as he then was, a priuate man.

Antiochus was full of busines: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trauaile, brought almost nothing to passe. Hee had beene at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leauing the Romanes, did put himselfe with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his sonne as before hath beene shewed, & went to Elea: whither he heard that Æmylius the Roman Admiral was come, to bring succour to Eumenes. There hee made an Ouerture of peace: about which to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Æmylius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul; this Treatie brake off. Then followed the Ouerthrow newly mentioned; which caused Seleucus to giue ouer the siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, foure or fiue Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of seuen and thirty Sayle, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could doe to Apollonius; and hauing the victory taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retrait, that the Rhodians durst not farre aduenture vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Præfaces vnto the warre; the last and greatest was a victorie of the Romanes by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The battaile was fought by Myonnesus a Promontorie in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him foure-score and nine Gallies; and fiue of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, wherewith Antiochus vanted the last yeere, That his Armada should couer all the shores of Greece. The Romanes had eight and fiftie Gallies; the Rhodians, two and twenty: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light-timbred and thin planckt, hauing all aduantage of speede, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to helpe themselues by the same deuice; with which, fiue of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemy: who declining them for feare, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Nauie hoysted saile: and hauing a faire winde, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet fortie of their Gallies they left behinde them: whereof thirteene were taken: all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellowes lost only two or three shippes: but got heereby the absolute Masterie of the Sea.

The report of this misaduenture, may seeme to haue taken from Antiochus all vse of reason. For as if no hope had beene remayning, to defend those places that hee held in Europe: He presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily haue beene kept, euen till the end of Winter following, and haue reduced the besiegers (if the siege had beene continued obstinately) vnto termes of great extremitie. Hee also gaue ouer the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought saue onely of defence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellespont, but had yeelded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in readinesse, to transport him ouer into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that Hee landed quietly at his owne good ease; euen as if the Countrie had beene his alreadie. The first newes that he heard of the Enemie, was by an Embassador that came to sue for peace. This Embassador declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romanes heeretofore, did now perswade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampsacus, and Lysimachia, had beene the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now alreadie giuen ouer Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to striue with the Romans about Lampsacus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with warre? If it was their desire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should bee also set at libertie, or otherwise deliuered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, diuiding them from the King, might not be vncertaine; and it should bee quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the Charges, whereat they had beene in this warre. So praying the Romanes to hold themselues content with these good offers, and not to bee too insolent vpon confidence of their fortune; He expected their answere. These offers which to the Embassadour seemed so great, were iudged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since it began through his owne fault: and that He should not onely depart out of these few Townes, which he held in Æolis and Ionia; but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keep himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadors therefore saw, that that no better bargaine could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in priuate: and to him he promiſed a great quantitie of gold, together with the free reſtitution of his ſonne; who (it is vncertaine by what miſchance) was taken priſoner, and moſt honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwiſe to the reſtitution of his ſonne, than vpon Condition, That it might bee with making ſuch amends for the benefit, as became a priuate man. As for the publike buſineſſe: He onely ſaid thus much, That ſince Antiochus had alreadie forſaken Lyſimachia, and ſuffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, ſaid He, tell your King in my name, that I would aduiſe him to refuſe no Condition whereby he may haue peace.

The King was not any whit moued with this aduice. For ſeeing that the Conſul demanded of him no leſſe, than if he had beene alreadie ſubdued: little reaſon there was that he ſhould feare to come to battaile; wherein he could loſe, as he thought, no more, than by ſeeking to auoid it he muſt giue away. Hee had with him threeſcore and tenne thouſand Foot, and twelue thouſand Horſe, beſides two and fifty Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or ſythes, according to the manner of the Eaſterne Countries. Yet was he nothing pleaſed, to heare that the Conſul drew neere him apace as one haſtning to fight. But howſoeuer he was affected; He made ſo little ſhew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie ſicke at Elea, He ſent thither vnto him his ſonne without ranſome: as one both deſirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his ſickneſſe, and withall not deſirous to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne ſafetie. Thus ought his bountie to be conſtant. Otherwiſe it might be ſuſpected, That herein hee dealt craftily. For ſince he could haue none other ranſome of Scipio, than ſuch as an honourable man, that had no great ſtore of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe ſuch a courteſie before the battell, as would afterwards haue beene little worth; than to ſtay vntill the Romanes, perhaps victorious, ſhould exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recouerie of his ſonne: ſo as the ioy thereof was thought, to haue beene much auaileable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanitie, Hee ſaid onely thus much vnto thoſe that brought him this acceptable Preſent, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by aduiſing him not to fight vntill hee ſhall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to coniecture. Antiochus reſolued to follow his counſaile: and therefore withdrew himſelfe from about Thyatira, beyond the Riuer of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magneſia by Sipylus: where encamping, Hee fortified himſelfe as ſtrongly as hee could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Conſul; and ſate downe within foure miles of him. About a thouſand of the Kings Horſe, moſt of them Gallo-Greekes, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at firſt they ſlew ſome; and were anon, with ſome loſſe driuen backe ouer the Riuer. Two daies were quietly ſpent, whileſt neither the King nor the Romans would paſſe the water. The third day the Romanes made the aduenture: wherein they found no diſturbance, nor were at all oppoſed, vntill they came within two miles and a halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There as they were taking vp their lodging, they were charged by three thouſand Horſe and Foote: whom their ordinarie Corps du gard repelled. Foure dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and ſet them in order before the Trenches, without aduancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and preſented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Conſul tooke aduice what was to be done. For either they muſt fight vpon whatſoeuer diſaduantage, or elſe reſolue to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore ſubiect vnto many difficulties: vnleſſe they would ſtaine their honour by returning farre backe, to winter in a more conuenient place; and ſo defer the warre vntill the next Spring. The Roman ſouldier was throughlie perſwaded of that Enemies baſe temper. Wherefore it was the generall Crie, That this great Armie ſhould be aſſayled, euen in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were ſo many beaſts to be ſlaughtered, than men to bee fought with. Yet a day or two paſſed, in diſcouering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the ſafeſt way to ſet vpon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being very loth to diſhearten his men, by ſeeming to ſtand in feare of the Enemie, reſolued to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battells:

Hee alſo did the like; and aduanced ſo farre, that they might vnderſtand his meaning to fight.

The Romane Armie conſiſted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latines in each of which were fiue thouſand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as vſually, were in the points; the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted form, were diuided into Maniples. The Haſtati had the leading: after them follow the Principes, at ſuch diſtance as was vſuall; and laſt of all, the Triarij. Now beſide theſe, there were about three thouſand Auxiliaries; partly Achæans; and partly ſuch as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vtmoſt of all (ſaue ſome fiue hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almoſt three thouſand Horſe: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the reſt being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the riuer: yet foure Troups of horſe were placed there, though ſuch helpe ſeemed in a manner needleſſe. Two thouſand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Conſul had with him ſixeteene African Elephants, which he beſtowed in his Rere: foraſmuch as had they come to fight with thoſe of Antiochus, they onely would haue ſerued to diſcourage his men; as beeing ſure to bee beaten: the Indian beeing farre the greater, and more couragious beaſts: whereof Antiochus had likewiſe much aduantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diuerſly appointed, and not all accuſtomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the ſeuerall kindes, in ſuch wiſe as each might be of moſt vſe. The maine ſtrength of his Foote conſiſted in ſixteene thouſand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. Theſe hee placed in the middeſt, and diuided into tenne Battalions: euery one hauing two and thirty in File, and fiftie in Front. Betweene euery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beaſts, and ſuch as being adorned with Frontals, high Creſts, Towers on their backes, and beſides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in euery Tower, made a gallant and terrible ſhew. On the right hand of theſe were fifteene hundred Horſe of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thouſand Barbd Horſe: and a Regiment of almoſt a thouſand Horſe, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrie, and accompanied by ſome others. All which Troupes of Horſe, diuided in their ſeuerall kindes, doe ſeeme to haue followed one another in depth, rather than to haue bin ſtretched out in Front. Adioyning vnto theſe, were ſixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment; called the Argyraſpides, or Siluerſhields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like ſo valiant as thoſe of the ſame name, that had ſerued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelue hundred Archers on horſebacke, three thouſand light-armed Footee, two thouſand and fiue hundred Archers of Myſia; with foure thouſand ſlingers and Archers of the Cirtæans, & Elymæans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greekes, and Barbd Horſe: as alſo two thouſand Horſe that were ſent from Ariarathes, with two thouſand and ſeuen hundred of diuers Nations; and a Regiment of a thouſand Horſe more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troup, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In front of all theſe Horſe were the Chariots armed with hooks or ſythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon ſate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would ſerue to reach from thoſe high Camels. Beyond theſe were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Piſidians, Cyrtæans, Elymæans, and manie others, hauing alſo with them ſixteene Elephants. Antiochus himſelfe commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captains commanded ouer the Phalangiers.

The firſt on-ſet was giuen by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horſe; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foote; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, eaſily made fruſtrate the danger threatned by them both. For with ſhowtings, and noyſes, and ſome wounds, they were driuen out of the fielde; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the ſame harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Romane Horſe following this aduantage, charged vpon the left wing: whereas they found no reſiſtance; ſome being out of order; others being without courage. It is ſhamefull to rehearſe, and ſo ſtrange, that it may hardly ſeeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with with ſuch varieties of Auxiliaries, made little or no reſiſtance; but all of them fledde, in a manner, as ſoone as they were charged. Onely the King, Antiochus himſelfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and ſeeing the Latines, that ſtood oppoſite vnto him, weakely flanked with Horſe: gaue vpon them couragiouſly, and forced them to retire. But M. Æmilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, iſſued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perſwaſion, what by threates made them renew the fight. Succour alſo came from the right wing, where the Romanes were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus diſcouered the approach; Hee not onely turned his Horſe about, but ranne away vpon the ſpur without further tarriance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is ſaid to haue loſt in this battaile fiftie thouſand Foot, and foure thouſand Horſe; beſides thoſe that were taken. Of the Romanes, there were not ſlaine aboue three hundred Foot, and foure and twenty Horſe: of Eumenes his followers fiue and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the ſame night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the cuſtodie of Sardes, and the Caſtle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townesmen and Souldiors were ſo diſmayed with the greatneſſe of the Ouerthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in thoſe parts, without expecting ſummons, yeelded vp themſelues by Embaſſadors: whom they ſent to the Romanes, whileſt they were on the way. Neither were many daies ſpent, ere Antiochus his Embaſſador was in the Campe: hauing none other errand, than to know what it would pleaſe the Romanes to impoſe vpon the King his Maſter. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leaue to make the anſwere, becauſe that it ſhould bee gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he ſhould quite abandon his Dominions on this ſide Taurus. For their charges in that Warre, they required fifteene thouſand Talents: fiue hundred in hand; two thouſand and fiue hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome ſhould haue confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thouſand, in twelue yeeres next enſuing by euen portions. Likewiſe they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and ſome ſtore of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now beſides twentie hoſtages which they required, very earneſt they were to haue Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Ætolian, with ſome others who had ſtirred vp the King to this warre, deliuered into their hands. But any wiſe man might ſo eaſily haue perceiued, that it would be their purpoſe to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embaſſadour had full commiſſion, to refuſe nothing that ſhould be enioyned. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to ſend immediatelie to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Conſuls choſen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fuluius, and Cn. Manlius Volſo. The Ætolians deſired peace, but could not obtaine it: becauſe they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Conſuls ſhould make warre vpon the Ætolians; the other, vpon Antiochus in Aſia. Now though ſhortly there came newes that Antiochus was already vanquiſhed in battaile, and had ſubmitted himſelfe vnto all that could be required at his hands: yet ſince the State of Aſia was not like to bee ſo throughly ſetled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romane care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Aſia fell by lot, had not his Prouince changed.

Soone after this, came the Embaſſadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and ſome others: yea by King Eumenes in perſon; whoſe preſence added a goodly luſtre to the buſineſſe in hand. Concerning the peace to bee made with King Antiochus, there was no diſputation: it was generally approoued. All the trouble was, about the diſtribution of the purchaſe. King Eumenes reckoned vp his own deſerts; and comparing himſelfe with Maſaniſſa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had beene to the Numidian, ſince they had found him a King indeed, whereas Maſaniſſa was onely ſuch in title; and ſince both hee and his Father had alwaies beene their friends, euen in the very worſt of the Romane fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what hee would haue: He ſtill referring himſelfe to their courteſie; and they deſiring him to ſpeake plaine. At the length hee craued they would beſtow vpon him, as much of the Country by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought he it needfull, that they should trouble themselues with the care of giuing liberty to many of the Greeke Towns, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Townes had beene partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should be gainers by his ouerthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They desired the Senate to bee truely Patrons of the Grecian libertie; and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had bin subiect vnto Philip, and serued him in his Warre: which was not alleadged against him as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was ouercome. But the maine point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifully gaue away so much, that euery one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld vntill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had beene giuen vnto P. Scipio, it was thought conuenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiatick: which the fortune of his Victorie had no lesse deserued; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Ætolians, and the Gallogreekes, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fuluius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtaines a Triumph: being charged (among other obiections) with attempting to haue passed the bounds appointed as fatall to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies; the Bookes of Hermes; and that Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and faction among the Romane Nobilitie.

Marc. Fuluius and Cn. Manlius had the same charge diuided betweene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted so long a Truce to the Ætolians. But since, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughtie little Nation had not sought to humble it selfe to the Romane Maiestie, it was now to bee brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not vnexpected vpon the Ætolians. They had foreseene the danger, when their Embassadours were vtterly denied peace at Rome: and they had prouided the last remedie; which was, to entreate the Rhodians and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neyther were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well deuise, euen vpon helping themselues, by repurchase of Countries lost, where they spied aduantage.

Poore King Aminander liued in exile among them, whilest Philip of Macedon kept for him, possession of his Lands and Castles. But the Athamanians (besides that manie of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing beene long accustomed to serue a Mountaine Lord, that conuersed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of commaund, vsed by the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They sent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their seruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vndertooke the worke. Yet assurance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. Hee was at the borders with a thousand Ætolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers hauing diuided themselues into foure parts, occupied, by the readie assistance of the multitude, foure of the chiefe Townes in the Countrie, to his vse. The fame of this good successe at first, with diuers letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip vnable to thinke vpon resistance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few dayes; giuing thereby some leisure vnto his King to prouide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence, and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home sixe thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all but two thousand behinde him, and so came to Athenæum, a litele Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying ouer Argithea, that was chiefe of the Countrie. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King had the boldnesse, to descend vpon Argithea; for that they might perceiue the Athamanians, all along the hill sides, ready to come downe vpon them, when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: especially when Aminander came in sight with his thousand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back, from-wards Argithea, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his own borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Athamanians and Ætolians way-layd them, and pursued them so closely, that their rout was in manner of a plaine flight, with great losse of men and armes; few of those escaping, that were left behinde, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, vntill Philip his returne.

The Ætolians hauing found the businesse of Athamania so easie, made an attempt in their owne behalfe, vpon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip, from whom they diligently reuolted, and became Ætolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had beene euer belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke Armes at first: but soone layed them away; seeing their neighbors ready to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the ioy was the lesse; for that newes came of Antiochus his last ouerthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Consul his hasting with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despight, that hee had recouered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither seemes it that the Romanes were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprouers. Fulvius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that hath beene the chiefe seate of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. With this he began; for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them be relieued, vnlesse they would aduenture to fight vpon equall ground. To helpe the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and ready to be driuen from their new conquest, by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who inuaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadours came; who besought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not bee terrified, by any violence of the assaylants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so bee driuen to leaue vnto his successour the honour of finishing the Warre. Wherefore hee gladly hearkened vnto the Ætolians, and bade them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouerdeare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his seruice as a mediatour, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his perswasions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demaunds and excuses, the conclusion was such as was grieuous to the weaker, but not vnsufferable. The same Embassadours of the Athenians and Rhodians, accompanied those of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made a verie grieuous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Heereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The Ætolians were bound to vphold the Maiestie of the people of Rome, and to obserue diuers Articles, which made them the lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romanes, than any people of Greece, they hauing beene the first that called these their Masters into the Countrie. The Ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romanes: who kept it for themselues (as not long since they had gotten Zacinthus from the Achaans, by stiffely pressing their owne right) that so they might haue possession along the coast of Greece, whilest they seemed to forbeare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was set down an Order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to haue the Romans Iudges of their controuersies, when they should arise. And heereof good vse will bee shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, vpon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consull, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gallo-Greekes and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio, of whose victorie, his acts were the consummation. He visited those Countries on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at Warres, without regard of the great alteration happened in Asia. From euery of these hee got somewhat; and by their quarrells found occasion to visite those Prouinces, into which hee should else haue wanted an errand. Hee was euen loaden with bootie, when, hauing fetcht a compasse about Asia, he came at length vpon the Gallogreekes. These had long domineered ouer the Countrie: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terror of their fore-passed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they did serue vnder King Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselues farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt vpon the Riuer Halys, in an In-land Countrie, where those enemies were not very like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had beene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeeld: then there was no counsaile thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Countrie, and, with all that they could carrie or driue, to betake themselues vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should vndertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbeare the attempt of forcing them, or easily bee repelled; and that finally, when hee had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this auailed not. For whereas the Gallogreekes had beene careless of furnishing themselues with casting weapons, as if stones would haue serued well enough for that purpose: the Romanes, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater aduantage in the difference of Armes, than impediment in disaduantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily preuaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallogreekes, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor hauing prepared their stones before-hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensiue Armes, could not hold out against the Arrowes and weapons of the Romane light armature: but were driuen from a piece of ground, which they had vndertaken to make good, vp into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselues headlong downe the steepe rockes. Few of their men did escape aliue: all their wiues, children, and goods became a prey vnto the Romanes. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation ouercome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them saued themselues by flight, as hauing fairer way at their backes.

These warres being ended: Fuluius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconsul, his Prouince for another yeere. Fuluius, in his second yeere, did little or nothing. Manlius gaue peace to those whom he had vanquished; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselues for feare of the Roman armes. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid vpon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. Hee also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto hee swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadours, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he tooke his way toward the Hellespont, loaden with spoile, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallogreekes had in so many yeeres extorted, from the wealthy Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needefull vse, which the Roman souldier had beene wont to take as the onely good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous houshold stuffe, and slaues of price, excellent Cookes, and Musicians for banquets, and in a word, with the seedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Hellespont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his iourney homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such bootie as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with a huge traine of baggage; the Thracians could not so well containe themselues. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwise than very pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry, seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were giuen to Eumenes. For he vnderstood, and afterwards gaue the Romans to vnderstand, that Eumenes could not haue abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the People of Rome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered vnto himselfe three thousand talents, and fiftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Aetolians; promising moreouer to restore vnto him all the Greeke Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to giue away not onely the halfe of Asia, but Chersonnesus and Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they bestowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeede with his Nobilitie to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained louingly the two Scipio's, which he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was growne into neere acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spaine and Africke. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipio's had not a disposing of that which they wonne from Antiochus: as neither indeede had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceede. When Philip therefore saw these vpstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, aduanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe vnregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that he had ioyned with Antiochus and the Aetolians, by whom he might haue beene freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentednesse the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be vrged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleeued, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans passing through their Countrie. They knew all aduantages; and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie, whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so farre aduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leaue behinde: though both the getting, and the sauing, did cost many liues, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought vntill it grew to night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselues; not without as much of the bootie, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus, and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fuluius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did very bitterly taxe, as an vnworthy Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it suffiseth that he made good answere, and was approoued by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to haue hindered the peace with Antiochus;

Liu. l. 38. they said, That with much adoe he was kept from leading his Armie ouer Taurus, and aduenturing vpon the calamitie threatned by Sibyls verses, vnto those that should passe the fatall bounds. What calamitie or ouerthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophecie threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe ouer Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before-hand won, in a sort, the Countries on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gaue to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeede the accomplishment of this prophecie, fell out neere about one time, with the restitution of Ptolemie King of Ægypt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to haue had reference vnto the same things, that were deuounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Ægyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, sowed at randome in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by euent; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolemie to his Kingdome by Gabinius the Roman, should haue any way betokened the comming of our Sauiour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers haue beene well pleased to interprete Sibyl in that prophecie. Of the Sibylline prædictions I haue sometimes thought reuerendly: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authority. But obseruation of the shamefull Idolatry, that vpon all occasions was aduanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well preuailed vpon my credulitie, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the iudgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent worke of Master Casaubon vpon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free me from mine errour; making it apparent, That not onely those prophecies of Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainely was shewed, but euen the bookes of Hermes, which haue borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoeuer deuised them) by the vndiscreet zeale of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthned with forreine proofes. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable Historie, reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors. Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy god. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should haue beene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not haue suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it beene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lined and flourished, would haue abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amisse in place of Semoni Sango: a title foure hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitrunius a Rebell, had many ages before beene consecrated Semoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historicall, than was conceiued by the Authour. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten post.

Euseb. Eccl. hist. c. 13.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richest, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasurie, was made the last paiment of those monies which the Common-wealth had borrowed from priuate men, in the second Punicke warre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, euen so long as hee well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the

the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called one after other into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Posteritie. P. Scipio the African, with whom they beganne, could not endure that such vnworthy men should question him, of purloyning from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargaine for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answere came; hee appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middest of the Assembly, and offered himselfe to speake. Hauing audience, he told the People, That vpon the same day of the yeere he had fought a great battell with Hannibal, and finished the Punike warre, by a signall victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitoll, and there giue thankes to Iupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-wealth. And hereto he inuited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if euer since the seuenteenth yeere of his life, vntill he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred vpon him, had preuented the capacitie of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatnesse of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, euen the Officers of the Court, followed Scipio, leauing the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne slaues and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to iudgement, vntill for very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, vnrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceiued that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the Citie, and his vnthankefull Romans, that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time he spent at Liternum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome againe. How many yeeres he liued, or whether he liued one whole yeere, in this voluntarie banishment; it is vncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere, with Hannibal and Philopœmen, as also of his priuate behauiour at Liternum, render it probable, that he out-liued the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to haue drawn him backe to his answere, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoeuer it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipio the Asiatique. They propounded a Decree vnto the People, touching mony receiued of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; That the Senate should giue charge vnto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and iudicially determine thereof. In fauour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of singular industrie; frugall also, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde he was euen faultie: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was hee vnmercifull and vnconscionable, in seeking to increase his owne wealth, by such meanes as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poysoned with enuie, troubled both himselfe and the whole Citie, whilest he liued. His meane birth caused him to hate the Nobilitie, especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his owne ranke, men raised by desert, if their aduancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant he had beene at Thermopyla, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carry it, hee tooke an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious periurie, That hee had not brought into the common Treasury some vessels of gold and siluer, gotten in the Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipioes grew partly, (besides his generall spight at the Nobility) from his owne first rising, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was giuen vnto himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did vtter his dislike of the Consuls bad husbandry (iudging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainely told him, That hee had no needs of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lyes he published, or for want of iudgement, thinking vnworthily of the vertue that was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports against his Generall; whose noble noble deedes confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipioes, whileſt it was nouriſhed by their enemy, brake out vpon aduantage, eſpecially againſt L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A ſeuere inquirie and iudgement being appointed of purpoſe againſt Scipio, matters were ſo carried, that he was ſeene condemned in a ſum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment, his body ſhould haue beene laid vp in priſon: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the ſame Tribune who had cauſed the ſuite againſt the African to be let fall. In his eſtate, which was confiſcated to the vſe of the Citie, when there neither appeared any ſigne of his hauing beene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found ſo much as what he had beene condemned to pay; then fell his accuſers, and all whoſe hands had beene againſt him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kinred, friends, and Clients made ſuch a collection for him, as would haue ſet him in better eſtate than before, if he had accepted it. Hee tooke no more than ſuch of his owne goods, as were of neceſſary vſe, being redeemed for him by his neereſt friends.

And thus began the ciuill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, vntill now, ſince the Punicke Warre. Securitie of danger from abroad, and ſome want of ſufficient employment, were eſpeciall helpes to the kindling of this fire; which firſt caught hold vpon that great Worthy, to whoſe vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into ſo great ſecurity her extreme danger. But theſe factious contentions did no long while containe themſelues within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in ſuch quarrelſome buſineſſe, grew to perfection, they that found themſelues ouer-matched by their aduerſaries, at this kinde of weapon, began to make oppoſition, firſt with clubs & ſtones, afterward with ſwords; and finally, proceeded from frayes and murders in the ſtreets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare vertue, that in honour of her two ſonnes was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, ſaw thoſe her two ſonnes, whileſt they were but yong, ſlaughtered in Rome, together with ſome of their friends, by thoſe whom they oppoſed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approued by the Senate. At theſe times the Senatours began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Conſuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Conſuls prouide, that the Commonweale receiue no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to haue wonne a great aduantage ouer the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by ſuch authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was ſo condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the ciuill warres; which giuing vnto Sylla, who preuailed therein, meanes to make himſelfe abſolute Lord of Rome, taught Ceſar, a man of higher ſpirit, to affect and obtaine the like ſoueraigne power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Conſul had finally cauſe to reioyce, of his hauing put in execution ſuch authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in paſſing their Lawes, by hurling of ſtones, and other violence, made the Citie ſtand in neede of a Soueraigne Lord: ſo the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as enemies thoſe that would not ſubmit themſelues, when they were ouer-topped by voyces in the Houſe, did compell Ceſar, or giue him at leaſt pretence, to right himſelfe by armes: wherewith preuailing againſt his aduerſaries, hee tooke ſuch order, that neither Senate, nor People, ſhould thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by inteſtine diſcord, the Romans conſuming all or moſt of their principall Citizens, loſt their owne freedome, and became ſubiects vnto the arbitrary gouernment of One: ſuffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their inſolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the higheſt Lords on Earth, to doe euen what they liſted. Yet had not Rome indeede attained hitherto vnto compleat greatneſſe, nor beleeued of her ſelfe as if ſhee had, whileſt a King ſate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this conſummation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the ſequele will diſcouer.

Chap. VI.

The second Macedonian Warre.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They deale insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being vnreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his sonne Demetrius; of whom thencefoorth hee becomes iealous.

After the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had beene, before the arriuall of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassals to the People of Rome. For of those fiue Prerogatiues belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whomsoeuer it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and warre, To beate Monie, and to reserue (as the French call it) le dernier resort, or the last Appeales, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeale, or last resort, as euery pettie iniurie offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselues within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined, He or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities vtterly dissolued. Neuertheless it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Offices of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especiall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of seruitude the seuerall Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankfull for their deliuerance from a yoke more sensibly grieuous; or, as being skilfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chiefe hope of thriuing; or, as being more fearfull of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes liuing further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformitie vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diuersion of their thoughts another way, giuing him leaue to vse his owne euen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little auaileable to him, that his Kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not throughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deserts) were they very louing vnto Masanissa, and to his House, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion setled in Africke: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subiection vnto themselues, by the ministery of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were vseful and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But such magnanimity was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their Estate, and a valuation of himselfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that he had lately giuen passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the wayes for them, and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needefull, to transport them ouer the Hellespont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themselues.

These Townes of Ænus and Maronea had beene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his dominion very far. He is thought to haue made himselfe Lord of Transsiluania: in which Prouince it is said, * That innumerable Medals of gold haue beene found, in the age of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victorie. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he liued not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of war, wherein he vanquished and slue Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolemie Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successours: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gaules being ouer-past, those Countries which lately had beene oppressed by them, recouered their libertie; and not onely held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to finde their aduantages, and make vse of them, euen vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefes commonly done by these, King Philip did prouide the most conuenient remedies: by shutting vp the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate: yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of iustice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Ætolians, of wrongfull vsurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia. Hereunto hee made a good answere, That his Garrison did onely saue it from the Thracians: who, as soone as he thence withdrew his men, did seize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might haue said, touching Ænus and Maronea; That they were places vnable to defend themselues, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not auayled him, in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Countrie thereabout, whilest Philip was busied in his former warre: and since they, by their victory had gotten vnto themselues all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Ænus and Maronea should be set at libertie: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonnesus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceiue, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Iudges betweene him and all that made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euery controuersie. Neuertheless, he sent Embassadours to Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes; wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Ætolians: wherein whatsoeuer hee had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadours: and would they now depriue him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By such allegations either he was likely to preuaile, or at leastwise to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what he had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had beene their Embassadours. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaued themselues, in pleading against him for their liberty, hee tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature he was very cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might haue little ioy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thra- cians by night, that they might sacke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done: but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could haue beene feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Maiestie, to an accompt. He would haue remooued the blame from himselfe, and layed it euen vpon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof he willed the Embassadours to enquire, among the Maronites themselues: as well knowing, that they who survived, were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not vtter an offensiue word. But he found the Romans more seuere, and more throughly informed in the businesse, than to rest contented with such an answere. He was plainely told, that if he would discharge himselfe of the crime obiected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not beene at Maronea, nor neere to it, hee requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to giue away his friends. As for Cassander, because hee should tell no tales; hee tooke order to haue him poysoned by the way. By this wee see, that the doctrine, which Machiauel taught vnto Cæsar Borgia, to employ men in mischieuous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they haue performed the mischiefe; was not of his owne inuention. All ages haue giuen vs examples of this goodly policie, the later hauing beene apt schollers in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henry the eighth here in England, can beare good witnesse; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vniust Law that himselfe had deuised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an vnpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to haue brought vpon him the warre which he feared, before hee was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his yonger sonne Demetrius as Embassadour vnto the Senate: giuing him instructions, how to make answere to all complaints, and withall to deliuer his owne grieuances, in such wise that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that hee had beene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all euen for the present. Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be very acceptable vnto the Senate; as hauing beene well approued by them, when he was hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely, to preuaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that would be borne vnto his person.

Whilest this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilest hee, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to diuert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadours, that had beene Iudges betweene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuersies, which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedæmonians against the Achæans. It was obiected vnto the Achæans, That they had committed a grieuous slaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedæmon: That vnto this crueltie they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Prætor of the Achæans, made answere, That these banished Lacedæmonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them; were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselues committed that murder, whereof shamelesly they laid the blame vpon others: the Achæans hauing onely called those vnto iudgement, they were supposed to be chiefe authours of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes hauing slaine them, vpon priuate, though iust hatred, as they were comming to make answere for themselues. Concerning their throwing downe the walles of Lacedæmon, hee said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, hauing perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibite vnto them all kindes of fortifications: as the Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Vsurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these wals and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgus his ordinances; and gouerned the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Achæans; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedæmonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainely tolde App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadours, That hee and his Countrimen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselues thus constrained, to answere and giue account of their actions, as vassals and slaues to the People of Rome. For if they were indeede at libertie: why might not the Achæans as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busie themselues, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? For if the Romans would stand vpon their greatnesse; and intimate as they beganne, that the libertie of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselues to ratifie it: then must the Achæans haue recourse vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without periurie could not be violated; as reuerencing, and indeede fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answere of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state vpon him, he pronounced more like a Master than a Iudge, That if the Achæans would not be ruled by faire meanes, and earne thankes whilest they might; they should be compelled with a mischiefe, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Achæans; which groned to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet Feare preuailed aboue Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans to doe as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadours restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, verie soone after, did make voide all Iudgements of death or banishment, that had beene laid by the Achæans vpon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territory of Lacedæmon, should be suffered to continue a member of the Achæan Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made as it had beene an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enioy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discouered no lesse, as to them seemed, the loue which they bare vnto the Achæians, than the power which they had ouer them.

Into such slauery had the Greeks, and all Kings and Common-weales whatsoeuer, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselues; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsaile and perswasion of many wise and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls and Africans, all subdued by the Romans; and, by seeking Patronage, made meere vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so preuaile with them, but their priuate passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of selfe-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enioyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearefull seruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greekes very farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subiection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affection all the Countrey would be his, whensoeuer he should take armes, as shortly he was like to doe. Young Demetrius, comming home from Rome, brought with him the desired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignitie soone following. Hee had beene louingly vsed at Rome, and heard with great fauour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of obiections, whereto his youth, vnskilfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answere: it was permitted vnto him, to reade such briefe notes as hee had receiued from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne sake, as they then said and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the entreatie of his sonne, together with some insolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his his hatred vnto Rome, and breede in him a iealousie of his too forward sonne. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadours from Rome; some bringing one commandement; some another; and some, requiring him to fulfill those things, which had beene imposed vpon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that obserued his countenance: and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that he had done things vnwillingly, and would be obedient, no longer than he needes must. With these Embassadours yong Demetrius was conuersant: rather perhaps out of simplicitie, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder son of the King, should not succeede vnto his father; but that the Diademe should be conferred vpon Demetrius; if not by some other pretence, yet by meere fauour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perseus, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his yonger sonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceede vnto the bitter fruits of this iealousie; it will not be amisse, to speake of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

§. II.

The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Militarie profession is of all other the most vnhappie: notwithstanding some examples, which may seeme to proue the contrary.

THE Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so peremptorie with the Achæans; that they seemed not vnlikely to take part against them, in any controuersie that should be moued. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed vnto the Achæan Commonwealth, hauing long beene of a contrary Faction thereto; gew bold to withdraw themselues from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, seuered from communion with any other. This was the deuice of some that were powerfull in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose, and not ouer-strongly affected in the businesse; were carefull to seeke occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessitie of standing out, and of not returning to the Achæan League. And hereupon they began to doe some acts of hostilitie; whereby it was probable that bloud should bee drawne, and either side so farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Vpon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopœmen, then Prætor of the Achæans, leuied such forces as hee could in haste, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Achæans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soone in a readinesse to wait vpon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that vsually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messenians; whom hee charged, and forced to runne. But whilest his horsemen were too earnest in following the chace; there arriued, by chance, a supply of fiue hundred from Messene, which gaue new courage vnto those that were fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopœmens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopœmen himselfe had long beene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatnesse of his courage would not suffer him, to be negligent of their safetie, which had so willingly aduentured themselues vnder his conduct. Hee tooke vpon him to make the Retrait: and suffering his Horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching ouer-neere to him. But it fell out vnhappily, that being cast to ground by a fall of his Horse, and being withall in very weake plight of body, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleeued their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farre from being beleeued, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ranne foorth to meet him, and behold the ſpectacle ſeeming ſo incredible. They cauſed him to be brought into the Treater, that there they might ſatisfie themſelues with beholding him. The greateſt part of them had compaſſion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the ſingular benefits by him done vnto them, eſpecially in deliuering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifeſt their good will for his deliuerie. Contrariwiſe, Dinocrates and his Faction were deſirous haſtily to take away his life: becauſe they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leaue any diſgrace, or iniurie, done to him, vnreuenged. They durſt not one truſt another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a ſtrong vault vnder ground, that had beene made for the cuſtody of their Treaſure. So thither they let him downe faſt bound, and with an engine laid an heauie ſtone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not ſtayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his preſent death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cuppe of poyſon, which Philopœmen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horſemen were eſcaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was ſafe; when he heard an anſwere to his minde, he ſaid it was well: and ſo with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his laſt draught. He was ſeuentie yeeres old, and weakned with long ſickneſſe, whereby the poyſon wrought the ſooner, and eaſily tooke away his life. The Achæans, when they miſſed him in their flight, were maruellouſly offended with themſelues, for that they had beene more mindefull to preſerue their owne liues, than to looke vnto the ſafetie of ſo excellent a Commander. Whileſt they were deuiſing what to doe in ſuch a caſe: they got aduertiſement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: ſo as Embaſſadours were forthwith diſpatched vnto Meſſene, craning his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, incaſe that faire meanes would not ſerue. Lycortas was choſen Generall of the Armie againſt Meſſene: who comming thither, and laying ſiege to the Towne, enforced it in ſhort ſpace to yeelde. Then Dinocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands vpon himſelfe, and made an end of his owne life. The reſt of thoſe that had beene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the aſhes of Philopœmen that were carried home in ſolemne pompe to Megalopolis; where they were all of them ſlaine at his funerall, as ſacrifices to his Ghoſt whom they had offended. Q. Martius, a Roman Embaſſadour, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occaſion or other, the Roman Embaſſadours were ſeldome abſent. Hee would haue entermedled in this buſineſſe of Meſſene, had not Lycortas made ſhort worke, and left him nothing to doe.

About the ſame time was T. Quintius Flaminius ſent Embaſſadour to Pruſias King of Bithynia: not ſo much to withdraw him from proſecuting the warre againſt Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the moſt ſpightfull enemy in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Pruſias (therein vnworthy of the Crowne he wore) did readily condeſcend: or rather (as Liuie thinkes) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him aliue to Flaminius. For vpon the firſt conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiors were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine hauing found cauſe before this to ſuſpect the faith of Pruſias, had deuiſed ſome ſecret ſallies vnder-ground to ſaue himſelfe from any treaſonable and ſudden aſſault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-cloſed, he had recourſe to his laſt remedy: which he then was conſtrained to practiſe, as well to fruſtrate his enemies of their triumphing ouer him, as to ſaue himſelfe from their torture and mercileſſe hands; who, as hee well knew, would neither reſpect his famous enterpriſes, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he ſaw no way of eſcape, nor counſell to reſort vnto, hee tooke the poyſon into his hand, which he alwaies preſerued for a ſure Antidote againſt the ſharpeſt diſeaſes of aduerſe fortune; which being ready to ſwallow downe, he vttered theſe words: I will now (ſaid he) deliuer the Romans of that feare, which hath ſo many yeeres poſſeſt them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius ouer me, which am diſarmed, and betrayed into his hands, ſhall neuer be numbred among the reſt of his heroicall deedes: No; it ſhall make it manifeſt to all the Nations of the world, how farre the ancient Roman vertue is degenerate and corrupted. For ſuch was the nobleneſſe of their forefathers; as, when Pyrrhus inuaded them in Italie, and was ready to giue them battaile at their owne doores, they gaue him knowledge of the treaſon intended againſt him by poyſon:

ſon; whereas theſe of a later race haue employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore beene one of their Conſuls, to practiſe with Pruſias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith giuen, and contrary to the Lawes of Hoſpitalitie, to ſlaughter or deliuer vp his owne Gheſt. He then curſing the perſon of Pruſias, and all his, and deſiring the immortall gods to reuenge his infidelitie, dranke off the poyſon, and died.

In this yeere alſo (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopæmen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: theſe being, all of them, as great Captaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than vnfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whoſe Tragedie we haue now finiſhed, had he beene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might haue commanded ſuch ſupplies, as the Warre which he vndertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was ſo ſtrongly croſt by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to ſuſtaine it, did laſtly diſſolue it ſelfe in his owne, and in the common miſerie of his Countrey and Commonweale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and iealouſie of our Maſters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profeſſion more vnproſperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Captaines, being no Kings. For beſides the enuie and iealouſie of men, the ſpoyles, rapes, famine, ſlaughter of the innocent, vaſtation, and burnings, with a world of miſeries laied on the labouring man, are ſo hatefull to God, as with good reaſon did Monluc the Marſhall of France confeſſe, That were not the mercies of God infinite, and without reſtriction, it were in vaine for thoſe of his profeſsion to hope for any portion of them: ſeeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were alſo infinite. Howſoeuer, this is true, That the victories, which are obtained by many of the greateſt Commanders, are commonly either aſcribed to thoſe that ſerue vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardiſe of the Nation againſt whom they ſerue. For the moſt of others, whoſe vertues, haue raiſed them aboue the leuell of their inferiours, and haue ſurmounted their enuie: yet haue they beene rewarded in the end, either with diſgrace, baniſhment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Linius, L. Æmylius, and this our Scipio, whom wee haue lately buried. Among the Greekes wee reade of not many, that eſcaped theſe rewards. Yea, long before theſe times, it was a Legacie that Dauid bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine Ioab. With this fare Alexander feaſted Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Caſſander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Ætius: who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greateſt battaile, for the well fighting and reſolution of both Armies, that euer was ſtrucken in the world; for there fell of thoſe that fought beſide runne-awayes, an hundred and foureſcore thouſand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Ætius, hee had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whoſe perſwaſion Valentinian ſlue Ætius) murdered the Emperour, which hee neuer durſt attempt, Ætius liuing. And, beſides the loſſe of that Emperour, it is true, That with Ætius, the glory of the Weſterne Empire was rather diſſolued then obſcured. The ſame vnworthy deſtinie, or farre worſe, had Belliſarius; whoſe vndertakings and victories were ſo difficult and glorious, as after-ages ſuſpected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iuſtinian: and hee died a blinde begger. Narſes alſo, to the great preiudice of Chriſtian Religion, was diſgrac'd by Iuſtine. That rule of Cato againſt Scipio, hath been well obſerued in euery age ſince then; to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which ſtandeth in awe of any one man. And hence hath the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeede a Turkiſh one, That euery warlike Prince ſhould rather deſtroy his greateſt men of Warre, than ſuffer his owne glory to be obſcured by them. For this cauſe did Baiazet the ſecond diſpatch Baſſa Acomat; Selim ſtrangle Baſſa Muſtapha; and moſt of thoſe Princes bring to ruine the moſt of their Viſiers. Of the Spaniſh Nation, the great Gonſaluo, who draue the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Corſete, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Captaines of all Nations haue beene paid with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary, it may be ſaid, That many haue acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confeſſe. Yet muſt it be had withall in consideration, that these high places haue beene giuen, or offered, vnto very few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which haue oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which haue traiterously cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but haue vsed the aduantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, haue obtained those dignities, which vndeseruedly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that haue purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue; is farre more in seeming, than in deed. Phocas was a Souldiour, and by helpe of the Souldiours he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and with a barbarous cruelty, seldome found in any other than cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloudy aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him againe by Heraclius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniustly gotten; and set it on his owne head. Leontius laid hold vpon the Emperour Iustine, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: But Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre. Iustine, hauing recouered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Iustine, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastasius, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surprised his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for hauing wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse, and a needelesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius; how many others haue beene repayed with their owne cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Captaines to make themselues Kings, haue by Gods iustice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way of thriuing, by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoile of Enemies, and the liberalitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose seruice one hath well deserued. But scarce one of a thousand haue prospered by this course. For that obseruation, made by Salomon, of vnthankefulnesse in this kinde, hath beene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poore and wise man therein, and he deliuered the Citie by his wisdome: but none remembred this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thankes, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselues to haue beene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwiser sort of them thinke to sauour of some impotency in themselues. But in this respect they are oftentimes coozened and abused; which proues that weaknesse to be in them indeede, whereof they so gladly shun the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thankes; yet so, as those thankes are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captaines haue made, by enriching themselues with the spoyle of the enemy, they are very inquisitiue to search into it, and to strip the wel-deseruers out of their gettings: yea most iniuriously to rob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition: that euen they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, haue purloyned somewhat from the common Treasurie. Hereof I needе not to produce examples: that of the two Scipioes being so lately recited.

In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne safetie, she was constrained to vndertake, her Maiestie had no lesse cause to vse the seruice of Martiall men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeeres had; yet, according to the destiny of that profession, I doe not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admirall excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any seruice by them performed. And that her Maiestie had many aduised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witnesse, who in all her dayes neuer receiued dishonor, by the cowardise or infidelity of any Commander, by her selfe chosen and imployed.

For as all her old Captaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randol, Drewrie, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunstable, Bourchier, Barkeley, Bingham, and others:

ſo thoſe of a later and more dangerous imployment, whereof Norrice and Vere were the moſt famous, & who haue done as great honor to our Nation (for the meanes they had) as euer any did: thoſe (I ſay) with many other braue Colonels, haue left behinde them (beſides the reputation which they purchaſed with many trauels and wounds) nor title nor eſtate to their poſteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Berty L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Eſtates.

That her Maieſtie in the aduancement of her Men of warre did ſooner beleeue other men than her ſelfe, a diſeaſe vnto which many wiſe Princes, beſides her ſelfe, haue beene ſubiect, I ſay that ſuch a confidence, although it may ſeeme altogether to excuſe her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in ſome ſort accuſe her of weakeneſſe. And exceeding ſtrange it were, were not the cauſe manifeſt enough, that where the proſperous actions are ſo exceedingly prized, the Actors are ſo vnproſperous and ſo generally neglected. The cauſe, I ſay, which hath wrought one and the ſame effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that thoſe which are neereſt the perſon of Princes (which Martiall men ſeldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at leaſt magnifie a profeſſion farre more noble than their owne, ſeeing therein they ſhould onely minde their Maſters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing leſſe honour and reward to men of farre greater deſeruing, and of farre greater vſe than themſelues.

But his Maieſtie hath already payed the greateſt part of that debt. For beſides the relieuing by Penſions all the poorer ſort, hee hath honoured more Martiall men, than all the Kings of England haue done for this hundred yeeres.

He hath giuen a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkeable ſeruice, as well in the yeere 1588, as at Caliz, the Ilands, and in our owne Sea; hauing firſt commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Maieſtie hath changed the Baronies of Montioy and Burley into Earledomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Ruſſel, Carew, Danuers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chicheſter, Barons, for their gouernments and ſeruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elſewhere.

§. III.

Philip making prouiſion for warre againſt the Romans, deales hardly with many of his owne ſubiects. His negotiation with the Baſtarne. His crueltie. Hee ſuſpecteth his ſonne Demetrius. Demetrius accuſed by his brother Perſeus; and ſhortly after ſlaine, by his fathers appointment Philip repenteth him of his ſonnes death; whom hee findeth to haue beene innocent: and intending to reuenge it on Perſeus, he dieth.

Quintus Martius the Roman Embaſſador, who trauelled vp and downe, ſeeking what worke might bee found about Greece, had receiued inſtruction from the Senate, to vſe the moſt of his diligence in looking into the Eſtate of Macedon. At his returne home, that he might not ſeeme to haue diſcouered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatſoeuer they enioyned him; yet ſo, as it might appear, that ſuch his obedience would laſt no longer, than meere neceſſity ſhould enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and ſayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which hee was deuiſing. Now it was ſo indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obſequiouſneſſe to the Romanes, and foreſaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with ſafety of their honour, if they could finde conuenient meanes; or otherwiſe (as to him ſeemed apparent) by what meanes ſoeuer. Hee was in an ill caſe: as hauing beene already vanquiſhed by them; hauing loſt exceedingly both in ſtrength and reputation; hauing ſubiects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and hauing neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto vrged, would aduenture to take his part: yet he prouided as well as hee could deuiſe, againſt the neceſſitie which he daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cauſe to ſuſpect, that they would doe but bad ſeruice againſt the Romans, he compelled to forſake their dwellings, and remooued them all into Emathia. The Cities and Countrey, whence theſe were tranſplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whoſe faith he thought a great deale more aſſured, againſt thoſe enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, hee deuiſed vpon alluring the Baſtarnæ, a ſtrong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the riuer of Danubius, to abandon their ſeat, and come to him with all their multitude: who, beſides other great rewards, would helpe them to roote out the Dardanians, and take poſſeſſion of their Countrey. Theſe were like to do him notable ſeruice againſt the Romans: being not onely ſtout fighting men; but ſuch as being planted in thoſe quarters by him, would beare reſpect vnto him alone. The leaſt benefit that could bee hoped by their arriuall, muſt be the vtter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People alwaies troubleſome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whenſoeuer they found aduantage. Neither was it iudged any hard matter, to perſwade thoſe Baſtarnæ, by hope of ſpoyle, and other inticements, vnto a more deſperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it ſelfe. It was not knowne who ſhould withſtand them vpon the way: Rather it was thought, that the Scordiſci, and peraduenture ſome others, through whoſe Countries they were to paſſe, would accompanie them againſt the Romanes, were it onely in hope of ſpoyle. Now to facilitate the remoue of theſe Baſtarnæ from their owne habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, vpon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious iourney vnto them, that carried with them their wiues and children: Philip with gifts did purchaſe the good will of ſome Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to paſſe. And thus hee ſought meanes to ſtrengthen himſelfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were knowne vnto them; ſince he was not like to finde aſſiſtance from any ciuill Nation, about the whole compaſſe of the Mediterranean Seas. But theſe deuices were long ere they tooke effect: ſo as the Baſternæ came not before ſuch time as hee was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpoſe. In the meane time he neglected not the training of his men to Warre, and the exerciſe of them in ſome ſmall Expeditions, againſt thoſe wilde people that bordered vpon him, and ſtood worſt affected toward him.

But theſe his counſailes and proceedings were miſerably diſturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne houſe. The Families and whole Townes hips, which he had cauſed much againſt their wils to forſake their ancient dwellings, & betake themſelues to ſuch new habitations, as he in his diſcretion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at firſt contained it ſelfe within words: hee hauing done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwiſe than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long liued: which alſo hee did vnwillingly, being himſelfe ouer-ruled by neceſſitie, that ſeemed apparent. This euill therefore would ſoone haue bee ne determined, had not his cruell and vindicatiue nature made it worſe. Hee could not pardon words proceeding from iuſt ſorrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly did ſeeke reuenge where it was needleſſe. In his rage he cauſed many to die: among whom were ſome eminent men; and few or none of them deſeruedly. This encreaſed the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curſes. Which grew the more generall; when the King in a moſt barbarous and baſe fury, miſtruſting all alike whom hee had iniuried, thought himſelfe vnlike to be ſafe, vntill hee ſhould haue maſſacred all the children of thoſe parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmanly pleaſure, ſome accidents, more tragicall then perhaps he could haue deſired, gaue men cauſe to thinke (as they could not in reaſon thinke otherwiſe) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heauen, hee felt the like miſerie in his owne children. It is hard to ſay what the Romanes intended, in the extraordinary fauour which they ſhewed vnto Demetrius, the Kings younger ſonne. It may well bee (though it may be alſo ſuſpected) that they had no purpoſe to make and nouriſh diſſention betweene the brethren, but onely to cheriſh the vertue and towardlineſſe of Demetrius; like as we finde it in their Hiſtories. But their notable fauour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall reſpect of them, bred extreame iealouſie in the fathers head. If any cuſtome of the Romanes, the manner of their life, the faſhion of their apparell, or the vnſightly contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were ieſted at in ordinarie diſcourſe and table-talke, Demetrius was ſure to be preſently on fire, defending and prayſing them, euen in ſuch points as rather needed excuſe. This, and his daily conuerſation with their Embaſſadours, as often as they came, gaue his father cauſe to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counſaile held againſt them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuices with his elder ſonne Perſeus: who fearing ſo much leſt his brother ſhould ſtep betweene him and the ſucceſſion, conuerted wholly vnto his deſtruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perſeus was then thirty yeres old; of a ſtirring ſpirit, though much defectiue in valour. Demetrius was younger by fiue yeeres, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought olde and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practices, than his free ſpeeches diſcouered. The iealous head of the King hauing entertained ſuch ſuſpitions, that were much increaſed by the cunning practice of his elder ſonne, a ſlight occaſion made the fire breake out, that had long layne ſmothered. A Muſter, and ceremonious luſtration of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great ſolemnitie. The manner of it at the preſent was thus: They cleft in twaine a bitch; and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailes, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Armie was to paſſe. This done, the Armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very firſt originall, were borne before the Armie. Then followed the King between his two ſonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whom all the reſt of the Macedonians followed. Hauing performed other ceremonies, the Armie was diuided into two parts: which, vnder the Kings two ſonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight; vſing poles, and the like, in ſtead of their pikes and accuſtomed weapons. But in this preſent skirmiſh there appeared ſome extraordinary contention for the victorie: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-earneſtly ſeeke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good ſucceſſe in a greater triall. Some ſmall hurt there was done, and wounds giuen, euen with thoſe ſtakes, vntill Perſeus his ſide at length recoyled. Perſeus himſelfe was ſorry for this, as it had been ſome bad preſage: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good vſe. They were of the craftier ſort: who perceiuing which way the Kings fauour bent, and how all the courſes of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addreſſed their ſeruices to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they ſaid, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint againſt him; as if the heate of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that ſolemne paſtime. Each of the brethren was that day to feaſt his owne companions, and each of them had ſpies in the others lodging, to obſerue what was ſaid and done. One of Perſeus his Intelligencers behaued himſelfe ſo indiſcreetly, that he was taken & well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of dores. After ſome ſtore of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe viſit his brother, and ſee what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting ſuch of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet hee would leaue none of his traine behinde, but forced them all to beare him company. They, fearing to bee ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themſelues ſecretly to preuent all danger. Yet was there ſuch good eſpiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perſeus: who thereupon tumultuouſly locked vp his doores, as if he ſtood in feare to be aſſaulted in his houſe. Demetrius wondred to ſee himſelfe excluded, and fared very angerly with his brother. But Perſeus bidding him be gone as an enemie, and one whoſe murderous purpoſe was detected, ſent him away with entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accuſed the younger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, and in effect the ſame hath beene here recited, ſaue that by miſconſtruction all was made worſe. But the maine point of the accuſation, and which did aggrauate all the reſt, was, That Demetrius had vndertaken this murder, and would perhaps alſo dare to vndertake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romanes; by whom hee knew that hee ſhould be defended and borne out. For Perſeus made ſhew, as if the Romans did hate him; becauſe hee bore a due reſpect vnto his father, and was ſorrie to ſee him ſpoyled, and daily robbed of ſomewhat by them. And for this cauſe he ſaid it was, that they did animate his brother againſt him: as alſo that they ſought how to winne vnto Demetrius the loue of the Macedonians. For proofe hereof he cited a letter, ſent of late from T. Quintius to the King himſelfe: whereof the contents were, That hee had done wiſely in ſending Demetrius to Rome, and that he ſhould yet further doe well to ſend him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honourable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence hee enforced, That this counſell was giuen by Titus, of purpoſe to ſhake the allegeance of thoſe, that

ſhould wait vpon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become ſeruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made anſwere, by rehearſing all paſſages of the day and night foregoing, in ſuch manner as he remembred them, and had conceiued of them: bitterly reprehending Perſeus, that conuerted matters of Paſtime, and what was done or ſpoken in wine, to ſuch an accuſation, whereby he ſought his innocent brothers death. As for the loue which the Romanes did beare him; He ſaid that it grew, if not from his owne vertue, at leaſtwiſe from their opinion thereof: ſo as by any impious practice, He were more like to loſe it wholly, than to encreaſe it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not ſuch paſſions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; beſides thoſe that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The King pronounced like a father, though a iealous father; That he would conclude nothing vpon the exceſſe or error, whatſoeuer it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter, but vpon better obſeruation of their liues, manners, and whole carriage of themſelues both in word and deed. And herein he may ſeeme to haue dealt both iuſtly and compaſſionately. But from this time forward he gaue himſelf ouer wholly to Perſeus: vſing ſo little conference with his yonger ſonne, that when hee had matters of weight in hand, ſuch eſpecially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to haue him preſent, nor nere vnto him. Aboue all, he had eſpeciall care, to learne out what had paſſed betweene Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpoſe he ſent Embaſſadours to Rome, Philocles and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way intereſſed in the quarrells betweene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they ſaw the more in grace. Theſe brought home with them a letter, ſaid to bee written by Titus (whoſe ſeale they had counterfetted) vnto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious deſires had cauſed him to enter into practices vniuſtifiable, againſt his elder brother; which yet ſhould neuer take effect, for that Titus himſelfe would not be author, or abetter, of any impious deuice. This manner of excuſe did forcibly perſwade the King, to thinke his ſonne a dangerous traytor. To ſtrengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrius in cuſtodie, made ſhew as if hee had pitied the eſtate of the vnhappy Prince; and ſo wrung out of him his ſecret intentions, which he ſhortly diſcouered vnto Philip. It was the purpoſe of Demetrius to flye ſecretly to Rome; where he might hope not only to liue in ſafety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than hee could finde at home, of bettering ſuch claime as he had in reuerſion vnto the Crowne of Macedon. Whatſoeuer his hopes & meanings were, all came to nought through the falſhood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the eſcape, and in the meane while reuealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip reſolued to put his ſonne to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away priuily, for feare leſt the Romanes ſhould take the matter to heart, and hold it as a proofe ſufficient, at leaſt, of the Kings deſpight againſt them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappy Prince out of his life. This accurſed Miniſter of his Kings vnaduiſed ſentence, firſt gaue poyſon to Demetrius: which wrought neither ſo haſtily, nor ſo ſecretly, as was deſired. Hereupon hee ſent a couple of Ruffians, to finiſh the tragedie: who villainouſly accompliſhed their work by ſmothering that Prince, in whoſe life conſiſted the greateſt hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not beene found a King, that had thus cruellie dealt with any Prince of his owne bloud. The houſes of Lyſimachus and Caſſander fell either with themſelues, or euen vpon their heeles; by inteſtine diſcord and iealouſies, grounded on deſire of ſoueraigne rule, or feare of loſing it. By the like vnnaturall hatred, had almoſt beene cut off the lines of Ptolemie and Seleucus: which though narrowlie they eſcaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grieuouſly diſtempered. Contrariwiſe, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that vpſtart family of the Kings of Pergamus had raiſed it ſelfe to maruellous greatneſſe, in very ſhort ſpace, from the condition of meere ſlauery: whereof a principall cauſe was, the brotherly loue maintained by them, with ſingular commendation of their pietie. Neither was Philip ignorant of theſe examples; but is ſaid to haue propounded the laſt of them, to his owne children, as a patterne for them to imitate. Certainely hee had reaſon ſo to doe: not more more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fostrage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minoritie. But he was himselfe of an vnnaturall nature, & therefore vnmeete to be a good perswader vnto kindely affection. The murders by him done vpon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his bloud-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed vpon many innocents, both strangers, and subiects of his owne, did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne Poyson. After the death of his sonne, He too late began to examine the crimes that had beene obiected; and to weigh them in a more equall ballance. Then found he nothing that could giue him satisfaction, or by good probabilitie induce him to thinke, that malice had not bin contriuer of the whole processe. His onely remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might easily be perceiued in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause; than the remoue of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romanes were now no lesse to bee feared than at other times, when he, as hauing accomplished the most of his desires, left off his vsuall trouble of minde, and carefulnesse of making prouision against them. Hee was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well vnderstood the difference, betweene a rising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner desolate, some expecting his death; and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deepe melancholy; and filled his head with suspitious imaginations; the like whereof hee had neuer beene slow to apprehend. Hee was much vexed: and so much the more, for that hee knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus; continued so true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hatefull to Perseus: and thus becomming subiect vnto the same icalous impression which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This counsailour, when hee found that the anger conceiued against Perseus would not vent it selfe, and giue ease to the King, vntill the truth were knowne whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason obiected; as also that Philocles and Apelles, (the Embassadours which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that serued as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the businesse: made diligent inquirie after the truth. In thus doing, he found one Xychus, a man most likely to haue vnderstood what false dealing was vsed by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented vnto the King: saying, that this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to vtter what he knew. Xychus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himselfe, that he had beene employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he vnderstood that by the vnnaturall practice of one sonne, he had so wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous and innocent. He raged exceedingly against himselfe, and withall against the authors of the mischiefe. Vpon the first newes of this discouerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie, Philocles was taken: and either forasmuch as he could not denie it when Xychus confronted him, yeelded himselfe guilty, or else was put to torture. Perseus was now growne stronger, than that he should need to fly the Countrie: yet not so stout as to aduenture himselfe into his fathers presence. Hee kept on the borders of the Kingdome, towards Thrace, whilest his father wintered at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious sonne; tooke a resolution, to alien the Kingdome from him, and confer it vpon Antigonus. But his weake body, and excessiue griefe of minde, so disabled him in the trauell thereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his purpose to effect, hee was constrained to yeeld to nature: Hee had reigned about two and forty yeeres: alwaies full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexed himselfe with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would haue desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, hee might thanke his own peruerse condition: since his Vncle, King Antigonus, had left vnto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was iustly punished by feeling the difference betweene the imaginary happinesse of a Tyrant, which he affected, and the life of a King, whereof he little cared to performe the dutie. His death, euen whilest yet he was onely drawing neere, was fore-signified vnto Perseus, by Calligenes the Physician; who also concealed it a while from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the sudden, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine hee no lesse improuidently lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

How the Bastarne fell vpon Dardania. The behauior of Perseus in the beginning of his reigne. Some warres of the Romans: and how they suffered Masanissa cruelly to oppresse the Carthaginians. They quarrell with Perseus. They allow not their Confederates to make war without their leaue obtained. The Treason of Callicrates; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seekes friendship of the Athenians, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discouer their intent of warring vpon him.

IMmediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Bastarne into Thrace: where order had beene taken, long before, both for the free passage, and for the indemnitie of the Countrie. This compact was friendly obserued, as long as no other was knowne than that Philip did liue, to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his seruice. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize: then was all dasht and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markets vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarne would not be contented with reason, but became their owne caruers. Thus each part hauing lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew carefull of thriuing in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes; and the Bastarne had the vpper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little vse of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ouerthrow, receiued by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreame bad weather, which is said to haue afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, saue thirty thousand, which pierced on into Dardania. How these thirty thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It seemes that by the careless vsing of some victories, they drew losse vpon themselues: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions backe into their owne Countrey.

As for Perseus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romanes was likely to proue. Wherefore he wholly gaue his minde to the setling of his Estate: which well done, hee might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, eyther for warre or peace. To preuent all danger of rebellion, he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; hee sate personally to heare their causes in iudgement (though herein he was so ouer-diligent and curious, that one might haue perceiued this his vertue of iustice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. Aboue all, hee had care to auoid all necessitie of warre with Rome: and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadors thither, to renue the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was hee negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greekes, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein so excessiuely bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder how in few yeeres, to his vtter ruine, hee became so griping and tenacious. His feare was indeede the mastring passion, which ouer-ruled him, and changed him into so many shapes, as made it hard to discerne which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For proofe of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romanes continued, as they had long, busie in warres against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Istria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrells, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Ouer the Carthaginians they bore (as euer since the victory) a heauy hand: and suffered Masanissa to take from them what hee listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leaue of the Romans. Masanissa therefore had great aduantage ouer them, and was not ignorant how to vse it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoeuer he desired, ere their complaining Embassadours could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated, to leaue things as they found them.

So had He once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrie of Emporia; and so did he vse them againe and againe; with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masanissa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within awhile, restored to the right owners, for loue of his Wife Sophonisba, and of Asdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Masanissa take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whose iudgement the case was referred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all manner of submissiue obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this iniury, when Masanissa came vpon them againe, and tooke from them aboue seuentie Townes and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadours they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grieuously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their owne Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were so, that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masanissa, inuading their Country, howsoeuer hee was pleased to call it his: yet since he was confederate with the Romanes, they durst not presume to beare defensiue armes against him, but suffered themselues to be eaten vp, for feare of incurring the Romanes indignation. Wherefore they entreated, that either they might haue fairer iustice; or be suffered to defend their owne by strong hand; or at least, if right must wholly giue place to fauor, That the Romanes yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Masanissa should be allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romanes would let them vnderstand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gaue them peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselues in honour should thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Iudges; than continually to liue in feare, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And heerewithall the Embassadors threw themselues prostrate on the ground, weeping in hope to mooue compassion.

Here may we behold, the fruits of their enuy to that valiant house of the Barchines, of their irresolution, in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny worthing, in matter of expence, when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they seruants, euen to the seruants of those men, whose fathers they had oft chased, slaine, taken, & sold as bondslaues in the streets of Carthage, & in al Cities of Africk & Greece. Now haue they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often & so earnestly desired. Onely they want peace with Masanissa, once their mercinarie, and now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperitie as might haue beene their owne. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battell at Canna; than Hannibal that won it was vsed by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, euery man of them, all his priuate riches, vpon the Commonwealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without craning recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreame want, to set out an Armie into Spaine, at what time the enemy lay vnder their owne walls. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians hauing fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging vnto the vanquished. Their pittifull behauiour bredde peraduenture some commiseration; yet their teares may seeme to haue beene mistrusted, as proceeding no lesse from enuie vnto the Romanes, than from any feeling of their owne calamitie. They thought themselues able to fight with Masanissa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leaue as they sought, of defending their owne right by armes: but contrariwise, when without leaue obtained they presumed so farre, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they receiued a gentle answere, though they had otherwise little amends. Gulussa the sonne of Masanissa was then in Rome, and had not as yet craued audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his coming, and had related vnto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father not being throughly aware of any Embassadours thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not giuen him instructions, how to deale in that businesse. Onely it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counsell diuers nights, in the Temple of Æsculapius: whereupon he himselfe was dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these continuall enuies of the Romanes, and of his Father might not be ouermuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answere gaue little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replyed, that for Masanissa his sake, they had done, and would doe, whatsoeuer was reasonable; but that it stood not with their iustice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the couenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely to enioy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa, bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should doe well to send Embassadours, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian warre was euen ready to begin: at which time the Romanes were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians, (for feare of vrging them vnseasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better vsage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankefulnes; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should be vanquished, he made none other account, than that all Africke round about him, and Carthage therewithall, should be his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been vnmindfull of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadours; that is, with honourable spies to obserue his behauiour. These Hee entertained kindely at first, vntill (which fell out ere long) he perceiued whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, vntill the Bastarna were thence gone; though he protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done, to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) that he did vnto other some. Where hee did harme to any, they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where hee did good, they called forth his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subiects, (vpon what occasion it is vncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slue Euphranor, whom hee had appointed their gouernour. It seemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonians: and therefore vnlikely to haue presumed so farre, vnlesse either they had beene extremely prouoked, or else were secretly animated by the Romanes. Whatsoeuer it was that bred this courage in them, Perseus did soone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romanes tooke very angerly this presumption of the King: euen as if hee had inuaded some Countrie of their Italian confederates, & not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would haue had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had hee humbled once his necke, they could themselues haue done the part of Masanissa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league between them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine haue reduced the Greekes, & generally all their adherents, euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equall termes: whom vsually they rewarded with a frowne, whensoeuer they presumed to right themselues by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Achæans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne caruers, and whose hope of extraordinarie fauour at Rome caused them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to haue chastised the Messenians by warre; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie: yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, euen with Lordly threates, when they tooke vpon them to carry any businesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuertheless, vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute libertie, as by which they were not like to thriue; especially in vsurping the practice of Armes, which belonged onely to the Imperiall Cities. In learning this hard lesson, they were such vntoward Schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharpe correction. Polyb. Legat. 51. & 53. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Romane Senate, being desirous to humble the Achæans, refused not onely to giue them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweene them; but further, with a careless insolencie, reiected this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemie might not be supplied from Italie, with victualls or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argiues, Lacedæmonians, or Corinthians, would reuolt from the Achæans; they themselues would thinke it a businesse no way concerning them.

This was presently after the death of Philopœmen: at what time it was beleeued, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not vpheld by countenance of the Romanes. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Achæans had vtterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no Town rebelled from the Achæans, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romanes with an ill-fauoured grace, tell the same Embassadours, to whose petition they had made such bad answere (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie,) That they had streightly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained grauitie, to haue serued their owne turnes; they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume vnto themselues a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of Warre, which dissemblingly they would haue seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make Warre, whether offensiue or defensiue; though it were against meere strangers; without interposing the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnlesse peraduenture sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Romane Arts howsoeuer many (for gainefull or timerous respects) would seeme to vnderstand them; yet were generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, hauing neither subiects of their owne that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into subiection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practice their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselues in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Mithridates: being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-weales and Kingdomes, that with ouer-nice diligence stroue to preserue their liberties and lands, from consuming by piece-meale: they were to bee deuoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most vnpliant, and wherein many of the Greekes began to haue affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow than to breake.

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subiects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopœmen had long since foretold, of the miserable subiection, whereinto Greece was likely to bee reduced, by the Romane patronage. Indeede they not onely perceiued the approching danger: but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselues grieued with the present subiection, whereto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to choose among themselues none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrie, and would for no ambition, or other seruile respect, bee flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soone be at an end; when honestie and loue of the Common weale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this carefull prouision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not throughly aduertised: eyther becauſe things were diligently concealed from their Embassadours, whom all men knew to bee little better than Spies; or becauſe little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traytors (of whom euery Citie in Greece had too many) as were men vnregarded among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truely; or perhaps becauſe the Embassadours themselues, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne desires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from these that are feared or flattered by many. The Achæans being to send Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callicrates, among others, to go in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man; one may perceiue the aduantage, which mischieuous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, haue against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselues into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition; that he chose much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore in stead of well discharging his credence, and alleadging what was meetest in iustification of his people: he vttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Achæans and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heauy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the setling of their authority, among his froward Countrimen; if they meant not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken vp a custome, to stand vpon points of confederacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee in regard; any iniunction from Rome notwithstanding.

Hence grew it, that the Achæans both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselues, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if Hee, and some other of his opinion, might haue their wills: who ceased not to affirme, That no Columes or Monument erected, nor no solemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obseruance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romanes willed the contrarie. But it was euen the fault of the Romans themselues, That the multitude refused to giue eare vnto such perswasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vsed to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which vndertooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming neuer so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increase apace, & they became the preualent faction. It was therfore strange how the Fathers could so neglect the aduancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiesty. More wisely, though with seditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greekes: who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, vpon men otherwise of little account or desert; only for hauing vttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughlie those that were obstinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resolued to follow this good counsaile, in euerie point; yea to depresse all those that held with the right, and to set vp their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not onely dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achæans, than had beene their manner in former times; but wrote at the present vnto all Cities of Greece; requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedæmon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callicrates, they aduised all men, to be such, and ſo affected, as hee was, in their ſeuerall common-weales. With this diſpatch, Callicrates returned home a ioyfull man: hauing brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himſelfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheleſſe hee forbore to vant himſelfe of his eloquence vſed in the Senate. Onely hee ſo reported his Embaſſage, that all men became fearefull of the danger, wherewith hee threatned thoſe that ſhould preſume to oppoſe the Romanes. By ſuch arts he obtained to be made Pretor of the Achæans: in which Magiſtracie, as in all his courſes following, hee omitted nothing, that might ſerue to manifeſt his ready obſequiouſneſſe vnto thoſe whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatning termes wonne many flatterers, and loſt as many true friends: ſo Perſeus on the other ſide, thinking by liberall gifts, and hopeful promiſes, to aſſure vnto himſelfe thoſe that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honeſter than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece diſtracted with factions: ſome holding with the Romans; ſome with the Macedonian; and ſome few, reſpecting onely the good of the Eſtates, wherein they liued. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not ſufferable, That a King, no better than their vaſſall, ſhould dare to become head of a faction againſt them. This therefore muſt be reckoned in the number of his treſpaſſes: whereof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, ſhall afford them iuſt occaſion to make warre vpon him. Perſeus hauing finiſhed his buſineſſe among the Dolopians, made a iourney to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his Armie along with him; yet went, and returned in ſuch peaceable and friendly wiſe, that no place was the worſe for his iourney, but the good affection towards him generally increaſed thereby. With thoſe that were in his way, he dealt himſelfe; to ſuch as lay further off, he ſent Embaſſadors or letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatſoeuer, done by his father, might be buried with his father; ſince his owne meaning was to hold friendſhip ſincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could haue beene pleaſed better, if hee had behaued himſelfe after a contrary faſhion, and done ſome acts of hoſtilitie in his paſſage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken ſuch a iourney, without their licence; this alſo was made a valuable matter, and caſt into the heape of his faults. He laboured greatly to recouer the loue of the Achæans: which his father had ſo loſt, that by a ſolemne decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was iealouſie perhaps, no leſſe than hatred, which cauſed them, at the firſt, to make ſuch a decree. For howſoeuer Philip had by manie vile acts, eſpecially by the death of the two Arati, giuen them cauſe to abhorre him: yet in the publike adminiſtration of their eſtate, he had, for the more part, been to them ſo beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall conſent, they reſolued to forſake him. Wherefore it was needfull, euen for preſeruation of concord among them, to vſe all circumſpection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country, towards him ſo doubtfully affected: eſpecially when by hearkening to his meſſages, they might make themſelues ſuſpected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of Warre, and when all danger of innouation was paſt; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nouriſhing deadly hatred, without leauing means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achæans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like ſort, forbidden the Kingdome of Macedon: yet vnderſtanding what would be due to them, if they ſhould aduenture thither, none of them durſt ſet foot therein. Hence it came to paſſe, that their bondmen, knowing a ſafe harbour, out of which their maſters could not fetch them, ranne daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the loſſe of ſuch, as made of their ſlaues very profitable vſe. But Perſeus tooke hold vpon this occaſion: as fitly ſeruing to pacifie thoſe, whoſe enmitie faine he would haue changed into loue. Hee therefore apprehended all theſe fugitiues, to ſend them home againe: and wrote vnto the Achæans, That as for good will vnto them, hee had taken paines to reſtore back their ſeruants; ſo ſhould they do very well to take order for keeping them, that heereafter they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily vnderſtood, & his letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearſed by the Pretor, before the Councell. But Callicrates tooke the matter very angerly; and bade them be aduiſed what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine deuice, to make them depart from the friendſhip of the Romanes. Heerewithall hee tooke vpon him, ſomewhat liberally, to make the Achæans beforehand acquainted with the Warre, that was comming vpon Perſeus from Rome. Hee told told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same warre; how Demetrius had beene made away, because of his good affection to the Romanes; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly Hee rehearsed all those matters, which were afterwards alleaged by the Romanes; the invasion of the Bastarne, vpon the Dardanians; the Kings iourny against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behauiour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he aduised them, to expect the euent of things, and not ouer-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Heereto good answer was made by the Prætors brother: That Callicrates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings cabbinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renued his league with the Romanes; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that Hee had louingly entertained their Embassadors. This beeing so: why might not the Achæans, as well as the Ætolians, Thessalians, Epirots, and all the Greekes, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuertheless Callicrates was growne a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-stiffely gainesay him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto further deliberation: and answere made the whilest, That since the King had onely sent a letter without an Embassadour; they knew not how to resolue. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and conuenient. But when Perseus, herewith not contented, would needes vrge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to giue audience: which was proofe sufficient (to one that could vnderstand) of the condition wherein they liued. For harkening to this aduice of Callicrates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassadour: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended warre vpon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cause of warre was giuen.

§. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied with Pharnaces, the Rhodians and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemnes his enemies the Rhodians; with the causes thereof. The vnusuall stoutnesse of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt vpon Eumenes. The brotherly loue betweene Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his deuice to poyson some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree warre against him, and send him defiance. Other things, concerning the iustice of this warre.

Eumenes King of Pergamus had beene troubled, about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates his neighbours. Hee had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romanes: by whom hee was animated with comfortable words, and promise, That they, by their authoritie, would end the businesse, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the warre himselfe; and brought the Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to giue them. After this being at good leisure; he began to consider, how the affaires of Macedon stood vnder Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was very great: and therefore hee was glad to vnderstand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now besides his ancient and hæreditarie quarrell with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greekes, prodigall in that kinde, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to waxe euery where stale: whilest Perseus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuie borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despight of this indignitie, Hee stirred vp the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping the rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found he, in these poore & indirect courses of reuenge. The Lycians could not bee saued by his patronage, from seuere and cruell chastisement, giuen to them by the Rhodians. This rendred him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostilitie, little different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loued him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a Decree of the Achæans, as too vnmeasured, misbeseeming them to giue, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deseruings. All this (which he needed not to haue regarded, had hee not beene too vainely ambitious) befell him, especially for his being ouer-seruiceable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome, which if it fell, the libertie of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse heereof; hee thought it in vaine to striue any longer with bounty, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the generall fauor. And therefore hee resolued euen to ouerturne the foundations of this popularitie, by inducing the Romans vtterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian Kingdome, which all so vainly worshipped. Neither would it proue a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the Kingdome, as he had beene rewarded, for the like seruice, when Antiochus was vanquished. Liuie lib 42.

To this end hee made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to say which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnæ into Dardania; that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphi; the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermedling in businesse of neighbours; his riches, and his great prouisions: were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Onely he descended into particulars, hauing searched into all (as he professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee said, That Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and fiue thousand Horse, of his owne; money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand Mercenaries for ten yeeres; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Soldiours as many as hee should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driuen, either to liue vpon spoyle, or to take from his owne Subiects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to consider, that King Seleucus the sonne and successour of Antiochus the Great, had giuen his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus; and that these mariages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared He to tell them, (though seeming loth to vtter it plainely) That euen the enuie of their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied, or iustified (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans; & that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who inuaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie vnto the most: saying that he thought it his dutie to forewarne them; since it would be to Himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making warre vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to beleeue that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus, lest hee should set vpon them in Italie. Neuertheless forasmuch as they loued not to make war without faire pretence, not onely of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thankes were giuen to Eumenes, who had euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. Now though it were so that He told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadours, or vpon tales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostility against them; their iniustice, and oppression, would haue beene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatning them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselues: who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and securitie? Toward this iustification of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto; their more then vsuall curiositie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embaſſadours were at Rome, prouided of anſwers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would ſpeake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of Him, or of ſome about him, ſeemes to haue diſcloſed all: when the warineſſe of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable ſhew of ſome fearefull apprehenſion; againſt which, it behooued their wiſedome to neglect no poſſible remedy. Wherefore careleſſe audience was giuen to the Rhodian Embaſſadours; who accuſed Eumenes, as one more troubleſome to Aſia, than Antiochus had euer beene, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe, conueighed by Sea vnto Perſeus, his bride Laodice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifully requited, ſo the Romans de-Polyb. Legat: 60 & 61. ſpightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquiſhed, were ſetling themſelues in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embaſſadours came from Rome with ſtrange newes, which gaue new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it ſtood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne

Liu. lib. 42. protection any people or Nation by them vanquiſhed; and that the Lycians were by them aſſigned vnto thoſe of Rhodes, not as meere vaſſals, but as dependants and aſſociates. For proofe hereof, they referred themſelues vnto the commentaries of the tenne Embaſſadours, whom they had ſent to diſpoſe of things in Aſia, after the victory againſt King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Maſaniſſa, The Aetolians, and all other Kings or Eſtats, that were beholding to Rome for increaſing the number of their ſubiects, had cauſe to finde themſelues agrieued if they well conſidered the matter: ſince by force of this or the like decree, thoſe their ſubiects might eaſily be made their fellowes, whenſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe the Senate: though it were ſo, that all men knew the preſent meaning of the Senate, which was onely to plague the Rhodians, for their good will to Perſeus, by ſetting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Fathers could therefore ſee no reaſon to diſlike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embaſſadours; which indeed more neerely touched themſelues. Rather they honoured the King ſo much the more: for that others (as they would needes take it) conſpired againſt him, becauſe of his loue to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embaſſage they heard not ſo careleſly as angrily: though peradnenture it well contented them to finde cauſe of anger. For whereas at other times all cares had beene taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuſes: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perſeus deſired much to giue them ſatisfaction, concerning any deede or word of his, that might ſauour of hoſtilitie; but that, if his trauaile in this kinde proued vaine, then would he be ready to defend himſelfe by armes, and ſtand to the chance of warre, which often fals out contrary to expectation. Theſe bigge words may ſeeme to haue proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that was chiefe of the Embaſſadors; rather than from inſtruction giuen by the King, with whoſe faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reaſon, why Perſeus himſelfe might, at this time, thinke to ſpeede better by a ſhew of daring, than he was like to doe by any ſubmiſſion. For the eyes of all Greece being now caſt vpon him, as on the greateſt hope of deliuerance from the Roman ſeruitude; it was not expedient, that he ſhould leſſen, or perhaps vtterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by diſcouering his too much weakeneſſe of ſpirit, vnanſwerable to a worke of ſuch importance. Wherefore He, or his Embaſſador for him, was bold to ſet a good countenance on a game not very bad, but ſubiect (in appearance) to Fortune; which might haue beene his, had he knowne how to vſe it.

Now that this braue ry (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings owne heat; it appeares by his daring to aduenture ſoone after, on a practice that more iuſtly might anger the Romans, and giue them fairer ſhew of reaſon to make warre vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in turning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe ſacrifice to Apollo. Perſeus deadly hating him, and thirſting after his bloud, reſolued to way-lay him, and by making there of him a ſacrifice, to rid his owne hands of a moſt miſchieuous enemy. So there were appointed three or foure ſtout ruffians to doe the murder: who placing themſelues behinde a broken mud wall, on the ſide of a very narrow path leading vp from the Sea to the Temple; did thence aſſault the King; whom they ſorely bruiſed with great ſtones, and left for dead. They might haue finiſhed their worke; ſuch was the opportunitie of the place which they had choſen; but feare of bolting apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discouer them. Eumenes was conueighed away to the little Isle of Ægina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke vpon him as King, and either tooke or would haue taken to wife (supposing it be like a matter of State) Stratonica the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom he then thought the widdow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly loue, That when the King returned aliue home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, receiued none other checke, than, that Hee should forbeare to marrie with the Queene, vntill Hee were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdome. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the preiudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especiall fauour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to haue transferred the Kingdome from his brother to Him. By such concord of brethren was the Kingdome of Pergamus raised and vpheld: as might also that of Macedon haue beene, if Demetrius had liued and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad when he vnderstood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had saued all from discouerie. But as he was deceiued in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes liued: so was Hee beguiled in that other hope, of the concealement; which he vainly esteemed the lesse materiall. For Hee had written to one Praxo a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertaine the men whom he sent about this businesse: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassadour then attending vpon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundusium: who comming newly from the Court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Embassadour, and thereof discharged himselfe. Brundusium was the ordinary Port, for ships passing betweene Italie and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein he gaue entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, iourneying to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitalitie, he was commended to Perseus, and inuited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadours, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings secrets. The summe of all was, That he must needes doe a turne, in giuing to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare qualitie, sure in operation, yet not to be perceiued either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare lest the vertue of this medicine should be tryed vpon himselfe. But being once at libertie; he discouered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had neuer seene before, nor was like to see againe: and therefore, besides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as such a fellowes affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answere for himselfe; and in like sort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to haue had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such obiections were not to be made vnto a King, to proue the rightfulnesse of making warre vpon him; but rather vnto a subiect pleading for his life in iudgement. But howsoeuer the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proofe (which might haue beene easie) than any that wee finde by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perseus was very suteable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such priuate offences, it gaue him no priuiledge: they iudging him to haue offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not send men, to waste the Kingdome of Pergamus, or to besiege the Townes: might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no lesse breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword: was it lawfull for him to doe it by poyſon? Wherefore they preſently decreed warre againſt him; and ſent Embaſſadours to denounce it vnto him, vnleſſe he would yeelde to make ſuch amends as they ſhould require. He ſeemed at this time to haue beene ſo confident in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he deſired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at leaſt he thought by ſhew of courage, to make his enemies more calme. Hee cauſed the Embaſſadours to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them backe; and bade them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearſall of all matters, which they had long beene collecting againſt him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that Hee had entertained long and ſecret conference in the Ile of Samothrace, with Embaſſadours ſent to him out of Aſia, about ſome ill purpoſe. In regard of all which they peremptorily required ſatisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to giue defiance. Better they might haue ſtood vpon the euidence, brought againſt him by Rammius and Praxo. For if thoſe accuſations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwiſe they were deſtitute; it being no fault in a King, to be ſtrong, wel-beloued, and well friended. Perſeus anſwered, for the preſent, in a rage; calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Inſolent, and vnderminers of him by their daily Embaſſadors, that were no better then meere ſpies. Finally, he promiſed to giue them in writing their full anſwere: which was to this effect; That he would no longer ſtand to the league, made betweene them and his father, and renewed by himſelfe indeede onely for feare: but wiſhed them to deſcend to more equall conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would aduiſe, as they might alſo doe for theirs.

Polyb. Legat. 9 In the forme of the league betweene Philip and the Romans, as it is ſet downe by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconuenience in the future;
Liu. lib. 33. excepting thoſe which he immediately performed. But Liuie inſerts a clauſe, whereby he was expreſly forbidden, to make any war abroad, without leaue of the Romans. It is moſt likely, that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby euery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring ſhortly into league with Rome, did ſo binde the Kings hands, that he could no more make warre abroad, than if he had beene reſtrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that ſeeme an Article of the peace, which neuer was agreed vpon, but onely was inferred by conſequence. Now if the Romans would vrge this point further, and ſay, that the Macedonian might not beare defenſiue armes, without their permiſſion: then had Perſeus very iuſt reaſon to finde himſelfe agrieued. For ſince they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whileſt they themſelues were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elſewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why ſhould they now interpret the bargaine after another faſhion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chaſtiſe his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that inuaded Macedon? By ſuch allegations he maintained the right of his cauſe, in very milde ſort; when it was too late. At the preſent, by diſclaiming the league as vniuſt; he miniſtred occaſion vnto the Embaſſadours, to giue him defiance. Hauing heard the worſt of their meſſage; he commanded them to be gone out of his kingdome in three dayes. But either he ſhould haue beene leſſe vehement, or more conſtant in his reſolution. For if his heart could ſerue him to vndertake the warre; he ſhould couragiouſly haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediatly, whileſt the Enemie was vnprepared; not haue loſt opportunitie, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worſe peace than the former.

§. VI.

§. VI.

The Romans solicit the Greekes, to ioyne with them in the Warre against Perseus. How the Greeks stood affected in that warre. The timorousnesse of Perseus. Martius a Roman Embassadour deludes him with hope of Peace. His forces. He takes the field, and winnes part of Thessalie. The forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what assistants the Romans had on his warre. Of Tempe in Thessalie; and what aduantages the Macedonian had, or might haue had, but lost by his feare. Perseus braues the Romans, fights with them; knowes not how to vse his victorie, sues for Peace, and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus having the worst in a skirmish, forsakes all the Countrey lying without Tempe. The Boeotians rebell against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders vnfortunate in the warre against Perseus. They vexe the Greekes their friends; for whose ease the Senate make provision, hauing heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanderes.

SO long had the Romans beene seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian warre, that well might they haue beene ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in prouisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were vnprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or hauing reason to beleeue, that their owne strength was such as would preuaile in the end; they hastily imbraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others, who must afterwards dearely pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeede any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the dissention betweene their seuerall Estates; howsoeuer the generalitie of them were inclined the same way. Neuertheless Embassadours were sent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadours vsed as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greekes were now growne well acquainted with such Roman courtesie: and vnderstood, that not only such as made refusall, but euen they who might seeme to haue granted halfe vnwillingly, were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romans; the * Achæans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtfull, euen when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their duetie. It is strange, that men could be so earnest to set vp the side, whereof they gladly would haue seene the ruine. The vulgar sort was euery where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Country, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one: who though Hee * iudged the victory of Perseus, like to proue hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wished hee the Romans ill to thriue, that so the Greekes might recouer perfect libertie: for his endeuours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appeares, that an extraordinary feare, and not onely reuerence of the Imperiall Citie, made the Achæans and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their feare, may be iustly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of Perseus himselfe. He had vndertaken a warre, whereof the benefit should redound, not onely to his owne Kingdome, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought ouer-sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speake the enemie faire, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that euery small thing would serue to terrifie him; and consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by giuing him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take reuenge at leisure vpon those which had assisted him: little cause was there, why any should aduenture to partake with him. He made indeede a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few Townes; and soliciting all to ioyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, he sought all meanes of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit vnto the Roman Embassadours. Q. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadours, and a man of more sinenesse in cunning than was vsuall among the Romans; made shew of inclination to the King desire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the King intreated, and obtained a meeting at the Riuer Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perseus made none other answere, than the same which they could haue made for him; yet the Embassadours, and especially Martius, tooke it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to giue the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conueniently be done; a truce was agreed vpon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was, to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readinesse, and might haue done much, ere the Roman Armie could haue beene in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; hee suffred a most conuenient season, of winning vpon the enemie, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had beene with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation betweene him and the Romans, whereby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better, and what hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadours also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the differences betweene him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodnesse of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poore helpes. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon point of Honour, was no better than meere vanity: his owne safety being the vtmost of his ambition. This his fearefulnesse might seeme excusable, and the blame thereof to appertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceiued his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessity, that was partly their owne: had it not bin his office, who tooke vpon him as their Champion, to giue such a manly beginning to the warre, as might incourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more auerse from him; and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to doe against the good liking of the Romans. The Bœotians also, who had entred of late into a strict societie with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a sort, they yeelded themselues as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission vnder a generall forme; but caused their seuerall Townes to make couenant apart, each for itselfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Common-weales, they might not (were they neuer so desirous to rebell) haue such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, vnder the Citie of Thebes. This worke, of separating the Bœotians from Thebes their head; was more than Agesilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedæmonians. So far more auaileable to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few braue Citizens; than was the societie with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedæmonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilest the King sate still, as being bound by the truce: and hauing done this, he returned to the Citie; where vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reproued it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadours which Perseus had sent; audience was giuen to them, for that they should not plainely see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreatie, would serue their turne, the Senate being resolued before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie, and had thirty daies respite allowed them to depart out of Italie: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the wals, in the Temple of Bellona (the vsuall place of giuing audience to open enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had onely the short warning of eleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtesie serue onely to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely meane, both to keepe a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when he should neede it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius, the Roman Consul, was at Apallonia, in a manner as soone, as the Macedonian Embassadours were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to haue rouzed Perseus, and haue made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was he contented to deliberate awhile, Whether it were not better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans, and to redeeme their good will with some part of his Kingdome, that so he might enioy the rest; than to put all at once to hazzard. But finally, the stoutest counsel preuailed; which also was the wisest, and so would haue proued, had it beene stoutly and wisely followed. He now beganne, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what should haue bin done long afore. Hee caused all his forces to be drawne together; and appointed their Rendeuous at Citium, a Towne in Macedon. All being in readinesse, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to I know not what Minerua, that was peculiarly honored in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His armie he found consisting of nine and thirtee thousand foot, and foure thousand horse: whereof about twelue thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest of his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with lively speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the goodnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his prouisions, and the many aduantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerefully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their seuerall abilities. He gaue them thankes: but answered, That his owne prouisions would abundantly suffice, willing them onely to furnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he issued forth into Thessalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that Countrey, in their iourney towards him. Some Townes of Thessalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend themselues; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wonne by force. Of these last was Mylæ, a Towne thought impregnable, and therefore, not more stoutly than proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a sally; which the Townesmen rashly made, and being driuen backe, receiued the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of warre was practised here: to the greater terrour of the obstinate. So Velatie and Connus (townes of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yeelded at the first. Hauing well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sycurium, a Towne seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemie.

Licinius the Consul brought with him onely two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from euery part of Greece, such aide as the seuerall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masanissa sent thither his sonne Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his young sonne, there to be brought vp: yet he did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe beganne within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had beene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Ptolemie (though Ptolemie was then young, and vnder Tutors) had businesse of their owne; the Syrian meaning to inuade the Ægyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian; yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a prettie tricke, wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals brother, serued him, for this his counterfet good will. This king had foure and fiftie ships, riding in the hauen of Dyrrachium, vncertain to what purpose: all which Lucretius tooke away, after a very kind sort, making shew to beleeue, That for none other end than to serue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this fleet. But whatsoeuer Gentius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his kingdome and himselfe, in the end of this warre; by offering, rather then giuing, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what hee brought ouer the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painefull iourney, through the mouneainous Countrey of Athamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had beene ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needes haue taken a great ouerthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the riuer Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he resolued, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to haue gotten quiet entrance into the Countrey. The land of Thessalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as hauing beene freed by them from a more heauie yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needefull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines, Ossa and Olympus (famous in Poesie) with their Spurres or branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; vnlesse they would make an hungrie iourney, thorow the countrey of the Dassaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small aduantage, by being master of the streigths leading into Tempe: though farre greater he might haue had, if by misspending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worse; yea to winne vpon them (for a while) euery yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might haue done farre greater things, had he seized vpon the streights of Aous, which his father once kept, and defended all the Countrey behinde the Mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreame difficultie, must the Romans haue either trauelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to be found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needefull, vnto the mercie of seas that were very dangerous; if hee would haue sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuised, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps be said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Ætolians, vpon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into suspition with the Romans (as wee shall finde anon) euen as soone as they met with Perseus. The Bœotians, how politikely soeuer Martius had wrought with them, aduentured themselues desperately in the Macedonian quarrell: what would they haue done, if hee at first had done his best? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after awhile began to wauer, when they saw things goe better with Perseus, then they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and encreased the number of his well-willers, yea and bought downe with money (as he might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them, Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps haue bin compelled to forsake their imperious patronage ouer Greece; & to render the liberty, by them giuen, entire; which otherwise was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this war, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue beene expected at first, from greater aduantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some riuer stay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such acts, as done, while the battell lasted, would haue won the victory: so fell it out with Perseus, In seeking to auoid the danger of that warre, whereof he should haue sought the honour, he left his friends that would haue stood by him, and gaue them cause to prouide for their owne safetie: yet being ouertaken by necessitie, hee chose rather to set his backe to the mountaines of Tempe, and defend himselfe with his proper forces, than to be driuen into such miserie, as was inevitable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him of the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessalie, it is hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul hauing no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arriued; kept within his trenches and lay still encamped by the Riuer of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time; did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore he inuited the Romans into the field; by wasting the land of the Pherians their confederats. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to aduenture euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his aduantage in horse would make the victory his owne. At his comming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselues to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Captaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, awhile together, Perseus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Hereby his boldnesse much increased; and much more his reputation: to the griefe of those who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes The Towne of Sycurium, where Perseus then lay, was twelues miles from the Romans: neither was there any conuenient watering in that long march, which vsed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but hee was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconueniences, he found out a lodging, seauen miles neerer to the enemy: whom hee visited the next day by the Sunne rising. His comming at such an vnusuall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though he brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vnfit to assaile the trenches, yet the Consull thought it necessarie, and resolued to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore hee sent foorth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature to trie their fortune: hee himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victory in a manner entire (though the Thessalians made a good retrait) with little losse of his owne. But he discouered his weakenesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile giuen by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should assault their Campe; and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vnsent for: he neuertheless tooke it for sound aduice, which indeede was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victory; by which meanes it was said, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it beene greater, and had he wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue beene the more, and the bolder. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, euen when he had the victory, what else did hee, than proclaime vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keepe him from yeelding to the Romans, whensoeuer they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the ioy of his victory would admit none of these considerations. Hee had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot hee had slaine about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twentie horse and fortie foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heauinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the enemy would ſet vpon it. Eumenes gaue counſaile to diſlodge by night, and remoue to a ſurer place beyond the Riuer Peneus. The Conſul, though aſhamed to profeſſe, by ſo doing, in what feare he ſtood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the loſſe paſt, than by ſtanding on proud tearmes, to draw vpon himſelfe a greater calamitie. So hee paſſed the Riuer in the dead of the night, and encamped more ſtrongly on the further ſide. The Ætolians were ſorely blamed for this loſſe: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occaſioned their flight, wherein the reſt of the Greekes followed them. Fiue of them, that were men of eſpeciall marke, had beene obſerued to be the firſt which turned their backes: an obſeruation likely to coſt them deare, at a time of better leiſure. As for the Theſſalians, their vertue was honoured with reward: ſo as the Greekes might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they would ſhunne indignation, or incurre fauour, then muſt they aduenture no leſſe for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne libertie. Thus fared it with the Conſul and his Armie. Perſeus came the next day to correct the former dayes errour; which how great it was, he not vntill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of ſafetie; whither they could neuer haue attained, if the King had either preſſed his victory, or giuen better heede to them that night: his light armature alone being ſufficient to haue rowted them whileſt they were conueying themſelues to the other ſide of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might haue beene done, ſince there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were choſen their Senators, and conſequently the Generals themſelues, Prætors, Conſuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten ſo ſhamefully, that they ſtole away by night, and ſuffered him to gather vp the ſpoyles of them without reſiſtance, as yeelding themſelues ouercome. With ſuch braue words did the King ſet out the glory of his action; diuiding the ſpoyles among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to haue made his honor ſound. He came neerer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopſelus, a place in the mid-way betweene Tempe and Lariſſa: as if it were his meaning to preſſe them ſomewhat harder. Neuertheleſſe he was eaſily perſwaded to vſe the occaſion, which he ſeemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore he ſent vnto the Conſul, and offered to yeeld vnto the ſame Conditions, wherein his Father had beene bound to the Romans; if the warre might ſo take end. It were needeleſſe here againe to ſhew the folly of this his courſe. Towards the accompliſhment of this deſired peace, there was in the Conſul no greater power than to grant a truce, whileſt Embaſſadours might goe to Rome: it reſting in the Senate and People to approue the conditions and ratifie the league. And of ſuch a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no ſmall diſcommoditie redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned anſwere, That other hope of peace there was none, ſaue that Perſeus would yeeld both his Kingdome and perſon, ſimply and abſolutely, to diſcretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius, to be ſo reſolute in aduerſitie. On the other ſide, it argued a faint heart in Perſeus, that hauing receiued an anſwere ſo peremptory, he ſtill perſiſted, making vaine offers of great tribute. Finding that the peace, which he ſo much deſired, could not be purchaſed with money, the King withdrew himſelfe backe to Sycurium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whoſe forces were well repaired by the coming of Miſagenes the ſonne of Maſaniſſa, with the aide before mentioned. This diſtance betweene the King and them, cauſed the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their harueſt: about which buſineſſe they ranged all ouer the fields. Their careleſſe demeanour gaue him hope to doe ſome notable exploit: which he attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon thoſe that were abroad. The Campe he thought to haue fired on the ſudden: but the alarme being taken in good ſeaſon, he failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers; he had a good hand vpon them, if he could haue withdrawne it, and giuen ouer in time. But whileſt he ſtroue to force a guard, he was viſited by the Conſul; by whom either in a skirmiſh of horſe, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battell, he was ouercome. This miſaduenture, whether great or ſmall, cauſed Perſeus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was; whereby what loſſe he felt, will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, ſaue onely Tempe, weakely guarded: and conſequently an eaſie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went ſtraight vnto Connus; hoping to haue taken it, it, and so to haue gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the worke too hard, he returned backe vnto the Perrhabians and others; from whom he won some townes, & among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul tooke, may seeme not to haue belonged vnto the Thessalians; vnlesse, perhaps, after his victory, Perseus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to giue a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defective. One may thinke it strange, that the Bœotians, whom a Roman Embassadour could terrifie, and bring altogether to his owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman Armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Navie on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other petie Townes, which by that same distraction of the Bœotians, became within themselues more absolute, than formerly they had beene. The causes hereof were to haue beene sought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoyling them, that hee would haue brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreame oppression he could haue driuen them so farre. Neither was Licinius the Consul vndiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is said in generall; That in the warre which hee made, hee cruelly and couetously demeaned himselfe. Liu lib. 42.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hostilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hostilius shewed more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the warre against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman warre vpon his kingdome, after that the Consul had sought passage in vaine ouer certaine mountaines, Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeede on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Armie of foure thousand, and who, by leauies made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his Armie. But Claudius thinking to haue taken Vscana, a border Towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such careless order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; sallied foorth vpon him, ouerthrew him, and chased him so farre, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this Towne of Vscana shortly after became Roman: which howsoeuer it happened, Perseus very soone recouered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys, a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, reuolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painefull iourney into Ætolia: where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee tooke in Aperantia, and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe throughly beaten by Clenas, one of his Lieutenants. Such successe had the Macedonian warre vnder Hostilius. The same Consul offended much the Greekes, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadours made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadours trauelling thorew all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who sought not by might and maine to aduance their businesse, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haue accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopœmen; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achæan horse; but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably discharged. The summe of the accusation should haue beene, That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But since no color of truth could be found, that might giue countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and giue gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: They demanded hostages, and found some in the Councell that approued the motion; as also among Polyb. Legat. 70. Polyb. Leg. 74

the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to haue Roman garrisons bestowed in their Townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction, accused not onely such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriotes; making it no lesse than a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thankes of their base flatterie; rating them openly in such sort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, euen in presence of the Embassadours. Thus was all full of accusations and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselues, as men that could beleeue none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vnlesse it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. Of this decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or seemed, a good remedy of many inconueniences. But they that standing on priuiledge hereof, refused to fulfill euery commandement, were numbred among the Patriotes; which in the end of this warre, proued little better, if not worse, than to haue beene Traytours. The Senate was driuen to set downe this order; by reason of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great sum of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loued not to haue their subiects oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seeke redresse of iniuries, or to offer their seruices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a Towne of the lesser Asia, there was presented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets, and a crowne of gold, to bestow vpon Iupiter in the Capitol. But hauing a desire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would be singular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the Towne Rome, and appointed anniuersarie games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddesse. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemie, and the like vaine men, that would be thought gods; or at the shameless flatterie of such as bestowed vpon men, and not the most vertuous of men, diuine honors; when hee sees a Towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a goddesse, and receiued (without scorne of the giuers, or shame of the present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

Q. Martius the Roman Consul, with extreme difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Dium quitted by Martius; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill successe. Their affaires in hard estate. Martius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius sent Embassadour to Martius from the Acheans. Polybius his honest wisdome beneficiall to the Acheans. King Eumenes growes auerse from the Romans. Perseus negotiates with Antiochus and Eumenes. His false dealing with Gentius King of Illyria, whom he drawes into the Roman warre. He sends Embassadors to the Rhodians, who vainly take vpon them to be arbitrators betweene him and the Romans. Perseus loseth a mightie succour of the Bastarna, by his wretched parsimonie.

After two yeeres of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had beene thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he liued in peace. Hee had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends, in all parts of Greece, tooke courage daily; and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the warre might proue, and thereupon to become wise for themselues. Contrariwise, Licinius and Hostilius the Consuls, had one after the

the other ſpent their time in vaine, ſeeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conqueſt, by very many loſſes receiued. The Romane Admiralls had ſo demeaned themſelues, that many Townes, euen of the beſt affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Romans ſide; and the Armie much leſſened, not onely by caſualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elſe of the Conſull himſelfe (for they laid the blame one vpon the other) in licencing the ſouldiers to depart. Quintus Martius the new Conſul, who ſucceeded vnto Hoſtilius, was to amend all this: which neuertheleſſe was more then he knew how to doe: though he brought with him a ſtrong ſupply of men. Hee began hotly to ſet the warre on foot, which a long time had ſlept. And hee began the right way: not ſeeking to force the ſtreights that were ſurely garded, but taking paines to clime the mountaines which were thought able to forbid all paſſage ouer them, without helpe or need of any cuſtodie. The King heard of his approach; and being vncertaine what way hee meant to take, diſtributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might giue entrance, or permit aſcent. But the Conſul proceeded in his iourney: with hope, either not to be diſcouered by the Enemie, or to breake through all oppoſition, or at leaſtwiſe, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they ſhould haue that lay to ſtop him, and at length, if all failed to make a ſafe retreat. He ſent before him foure thouſand of his moſt expedit foot, to diſcouer the waies. Two daies was this company troubled, in ouercomming the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles: after which they had ſight of the Enemie, that lay to denie their paſſage. They occupied therefore a ſafe peece of ground; and ſent backe word to the Conſul, where they were; intreating him to haſten vnto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit diſmayed at his arriuall; but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their owne Camp at night, with little loſſe on either ſide. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue ſcarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the reſt were beholders. In this caſe, it was impoſſible to get forwards: yet a ſhame to returne. Wherefore Martius tooke the onely courſe remaining; and indeed the beſt: Part of his men hee left with Popilius, to attend vpon the Macedonians: whileſt hee, with the reſt, fetcht a compaſſe about, and ſought out wayes that neuer had beene troden. Heerein hee found extreame difficultie: which notwithſtanding he ouercame. Beſides the troubles commonly incident to ſuch iourneyes, through places vnfit for habitation: hee was compelled, by labour of hand, to make paths where none were, yea where Nature might ſeeme to haue intended, that none ſhould be. So ſteepe he found the deſcent of the mountaines, in this way which he tooke: that of ſeuen miles, which they trauelled the firſt day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themſelues downe; as not daring to truſt their feet. Neither was this the worſt. For they met with rockes, that ſtood one ouer another, ſo vpright, and cumberſome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddy proſpect, and caſting their gouernours, made a terrible noyſe, which affrighted the horſes, and bredde great confuſion. Hauing therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grieuous iourney; there was nothing more deſired by the ſouldiours, than that they might be ſuffered to creep backe againe, the ſame way which they had come. But ſhift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kind of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was ioyned to the edge of the cliffe; the other ſuſtained by two long poſtes, faſtned in the ground below. Vpon theſe two poſtes, or poles, which indeede (not being very ſtrong, ſince it was intended that they ſhould bee either cut or broken) were faſtned two rafters, anſwerable in length to the diſtance, betweene the higher and the lower fall: ſo as the end of one bridge might reach vnto the beginning of another. Theſe were couered with plankes and turfe; that they might ſeeme continent with the ground, ſo to make the beaſts aduenturous to goe vpon them. If there were a plaine of any good extent from the foote of a rocke, to the next downefall, then might the bridge be ſhorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, vpon one of theſe, the poſts vpholding the frame were cut aſunder; thereby cauſing him to ſinke downe vnto the next bridge; whence he was conueyed in like manner, to the third, and onward ſtill to the verie bottome. Thus went they downe ſliding, ſome on their feet, others on their buttockes, till they came to an euen valley. By this it appeares, how throughly prouided the Romans vſed to be in their iourneyes, of things needfull in all occaſions: as alſo wha-

inestimable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conueyance of themselues and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested; staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps neuer, should haue ouertaken them, if the Enemie had followed, and set vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies iourneyes were like vnto the first: saue that custome, and the neerenesse to their waies end without meeting enemie, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: since they fought with his men vpon the passage, three daies together; he lying so nigh, that he might welneare haue heard the noyse. Yet was hee so possessed with feare; that he neither stirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any prouision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, sate hearkening after the euent. Foure onely passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romanes were vnable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the last, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whosoeuer would seeke any other way, must bee faine to take such paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, saue through the valley it selfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood vpon the foote of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the riuer Helicon becomming there a lake, and called Baphyras, tooke vp the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily haue beene fortified. Besides all these, there was in the middest of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the spurres of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neere to the verie bankes of Peneus, a goodly and deepe riuer which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had beene more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome iourney: if Perseus could haue seene his owne aduantages. For the Romane Armie was not onely in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable trauell: but must needs haue either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to return the same way that it came, if the King had made good the streight of Dium. To haue returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants and carriages, against those rocks, from which, with extreame labour, they could hardly get downe, it seemes a matter of impossibilitie: especially considering, how the enemy from aboue their heads, would haue beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though hee knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their iourney into Macedon, from the side of Illyria, whence that kingdome had often beene inuaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselues to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were arriued, there was no meanes to escape, without enforcing one of those passages, which they despaired to winne. For hee no sooner heard that the Enemie was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; then hee fared like one out of his wittes; saying, That hee was vanquished, and had lost all without battaile. Heere withall he began to take out of Dium, what hee could carry away in haste; and straight wayes abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, hee sent a strait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Niceas, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could: though soone after, his master grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recouered by Diuers from vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so hee preuented the damnage. Whether Niceas, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his carefull prouidence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their seruice was this. Perseus growing ashamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this hastie direction; caused them both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the Sea by their diuing, were payd their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no witnesse of the Kings base folly. Such end must they feare, who are priuie to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would haue gone surely to worke, worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally haue behaued himselfe, that no man might beleeue him to be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacitie. Hee thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippias away (the Captaine which had stopped the Consul on the top of the mountaine) and Asclepiodatus, from defence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed; he rated them openly; saying, that they had betraied vnto the Enemie the gates and barres of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselues, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they haue sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto: since the Roman Armie, this notwithstanding was hardly able to subsist, for want of victualls. He took Dium without resistance; and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein hauing trauelled about a daies iourney, and gotten one towne that yeelded, hee was compelled by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne backe towards Thessalie. His fleete came to him, in this time of necessitie, well appointed to haue holpen him in the warre: but hauing left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the prouisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had beene carefull to occupy one of the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those waies onely might corne be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was most desirously expected; he forlooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish iourney (if not worse then foolish) hee lost more, than a little the longer fasting had beene worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwise it had beene madnesse to put himselfe on such an enterprise, so slenderly prouided, as that without enforcement, or sight of the Enemie, hee should be faine to quite it. Howsoeuer it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a badde man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most behooued him to haue prosecuted the action.

By vnderstanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himselfe; vnderstood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore meanes as haue been shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the towne of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dis-mantled by the Romanes. This done; he encamped strongly by the riuer of Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vsed, would haue been enough, not onely to haue deliuered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to haue giuen him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romanes to seek a good end of the warre vpon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recouery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Onelie the towne of Heraclea, standing on the riuer of Peneus, fiue miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a tricke of climing vpon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could, and was not giuen vp for feare. After this Martius did set a bold face towards Dium, as if he would haue taken it againe, and haue driuen the King further off: although his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to prouide for his wintering. Hee sent the Admirall to make attempt vpon the Sea-Townes, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fieldes about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundry times aduentured forth of the Towne, were still put to the worse. As for the towne it selfe; there was danger in comming nere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engins, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall setting saile from thence, ran along by Ænia, and Antigonea, (landing neere to each of them, and both doing and receiuing hurt) vntill he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes ioyned with him, bringing twenty shippes of Warre: and fiue other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this accesse of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the towne: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not vpon the banke. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were were arches in the towne-wall filled vp with that earth, and couered with one ſingle row of bricke. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the towne, by ſapping the walls. To this worke he appointed ſuch as he thought meereſt: giuing an alarme to the other ſide of the Towne, thereby to ſhadow his attempt, the breach was ſoon made. But whileſt the Romanes wote ſhouting for ioy, and ordering themſelues for the aſſault: the Captaines within the towne perceiued what was done; and ſalying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the companies that were betweene the ditch and the wall; of whom they ſlew about ſixe hundred, and ſuffered few to eſcape vnwounded. This diſaſter, and the want of good ſucceſſe on that part of the towne which King Eumenes aſſailed (a ſupply in the meane while entring the towne by ſea) cauſed the ſiege to breake vp. Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meete to attempt: and thence likewiſe he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captaine, was gotten before his comming, with ſuch forces, as were not onely ſufficient to haue defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed ſiege to it, but to keepe the land about it from ſpoyle; or at leaſt (as they did) to make the enemy pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his iourney to Demetrias, by Melibœa; whither the Conſul (that he might not be quite without worke) had ſent his Lieutenant to beſiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing ſuddenly ouer their heads, cauſed the beſiegers to diſlodge in all haſte, ſetting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, ſo farre was their abilitie ſhort of their Enterpriſes; euer ſince their Conſul (whether daſtardly, or careleſly) moſt vnlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forſaking Dium: Yea, it is to be ſuſpected, that ſome greater harme befell them, or at leaſt, that they were in ſome greater danger, then is expreſſed in the broken remaining Hiſtorie of this Warre. For Martius perſwaded the Rhodians by Ageſipolis their Embaſſadour, who came to him at Heraclea about other buſineſſe of leſſe importance, That they ſhould doe well to interpoſe themſelues as mediatours, and ſeeke to finiſh the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe moſt probably coniecture, that this was rather a malicious deuice of Martius, craftily ſeeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their oppoſing the reſolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perſeus, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet ſince he made ſhew of feare, it is like withall, that ſomewhat had happened, which might make his feare ſeeme not counterfeit. And ſo were the Rhodians moued to thinke of him; not onely for that the extraordinary courteſie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embaſſadour, comming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cauſe it; but much more, for that ſhortly after the Embaſſadours of Perſeus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did ſet out their buſineſſe at Rhodes, not more with the ſtrength of a good fleete, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of ſome victory, wherein he had lately ſlaine great numbers of the Roman horſe. Thus much we finde intimated: though the time, place, or other circumſtances of the fight, be not ſpecified. And hereto may be referred, the report of thoſe that were ſent from Rome to view the eſtate of Martius his armie. For they found the Conſul wanting meat; the Admirall wanting men; and, for thoſe few that he had, wanting both money and cloathes: and Ap. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, ſo vnable to inuade Macedon, that contrariwiſe, he was in extreame danger, ſo as either he muſt quickly be ſent for thence, or a new army be ſent thither to him. Wherefore it may ſeeme, that ſome blow had bin taken on the Illyrian ſide, which made all to halt; or at leaſt, that the Romans with greater loſſe, than is before ſpoken of, had beene driuen from ſome of the Townes which they beſieged.

Polyb. Leg. 80.

Polyb. Leg. 87

Now although it were ſo, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himſelfe like a man of warre: yet in exerciſe of Cunning, which one hath moſt aptly termed, a crooked or ſiniſter kinde of wiſedome, he dealt as a craftſmaſter, with a reſtleſſe working diligence. This indeede neither proued his ſufficiency, nor commended his honeſtie: ſince thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuertheleſſe, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or ſuch delight as weake and buſie-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made oppoſition to the good of his Countrey. At ſuch time as Perſeus, by the ſucceſſe of his doings againſt Hoſtilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to inuade Thessalie; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriotes among the Achæans, iudged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romanes, as in a time of aduersitie, whom in prosperity they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo proposed a decree which passed: That the Achæans should send their whole power into Thessalie, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Armie was leuied; and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadors vnto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Consul busie in finding passage through Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Armie; and awaited the Consuls leisure till they came to Heraclea; where finding the time conuenient, he presented the Decree, and offered the seruice of his Nation, wherein soeuer it should bee commanded. Martius tooke this very kindely; but said, that he needed now no manner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behinde in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Achæans, fiue thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in fielde, he might doe notable seruice, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labirynthian head of Martius could not allow of such plaine reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of such aide, and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Achæans be put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius; musing and vnable to resolue whether it were for loue to the Achæans, that the Consull was so earnest in this businesse; or rather for enuie, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, since himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell touching this matter: then found hee a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne selfe, and those of his partie. For as hee was sure to incurre the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was giuen him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martius vttered to him in priuate, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alleaging that he had no need: In this case therefore, hee had recourse vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Romane Commanders should require, vnlesse by special order from the Senate; the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Consul: by whom it was sure to be made frustrate. Heereby the Achæans were sauers, of more then an hundred and twenty talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romanes with many a long yeares imprisonment. Polyb. Legat. 74.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in feare lest the fire, which he himselfe had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouersway all other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, haue not precisely affirmed any certainty. One report is, that Eumenes did not so much as giue any helpe to Martius: but comming to haue ioyned with him, in such friendly manner as hee did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that hee refused to leaue behinde him certaine horse of the Gallogreekes, being requested to haue done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Consul, did the Romanes good seruice: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the loue to Attalus. But it is more generally receiued; that Eumenes gaue a willing eare to Perseus his desire of accord, for meere desire of gaine. And it might well be, that couetousnesse drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. Howsoeuer it befell; Perseus caused Eumenes to be sounded, and found him so tractable, that hee was bold to sollicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his aduertisements, both to Eumenes & Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue betweene a King and a free Citie: That the Romanes had quarrell alike to all Kings, though they dealt with ho more than one at a time, and vsed the helpe of one against another; That Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, assailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Heerewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort hee admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Ægyptian, so long as the Romanes could make him giue ouer, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, hee requested both of them, either to compell the Romanes to surcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all Kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should giue answere; he began to offer a bargaine of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, then Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he promised, for his own part, That if he might haue fifteene hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war, then would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I find not) he would also bring the Romanes to condescend vnto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to giue hostages. Perseus liked well to receiue the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine haue peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes onely. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded & ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his owne: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no neerer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserued somewhat, howsoeuer the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needes he would haue part of his wages in prest. Thus the two Kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traytor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainely, and said, That without money he could not stirre. Hereunto Perseus loued not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serue at the last cast, to deliuer him from all his feares. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his feare vrge him to prodigalitie; so as hee agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargaine was soone made, and pledges on both sides deliuered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus; to the end that all his Armie might haue comfort, by such accesse of strength to their partie. Presently vpon the bargaine made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the Rhodians, to take vpon them, as arbitrators, betweene Perseus and the Romanes, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Consul was no lesse desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselues conformable. But the Romane Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadours; gaue an answere as disdainfull, angry, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vaine glory of the Rhodians was throughly chastised; and more throughly should haue beene, if their submission had not been as humble, as their follie was proud. Such vse of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus; without laying out one ounce of Siluer. Now faine he would haue hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus the Macedonian Embassadour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the Warre by land and sea, whilest the Romans were vnprouided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus, Heereupon tenne Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who deliuered it to the yong King, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeede; and sealed vp with the seale of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentius had layed hands vpon two Romane Embassadours, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their loade to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

Liu. lib. 44. Plutar. in vit. Æmyl.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, vnder one Clondicus a petie King, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gaules, which were were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarne. These had before-hand made their bargaine, and were to receiue present pay at the first. At their entry into the Kingdome, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Captaines to come visit him, whom he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to giue the souldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the messenger had not what to answer. Why then (said Clondicus) tell thy master, That the Gaules will not stirre one foote further, vntill they haue gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perseus hereupon tooke counsaile: if to vtter his owne opinion, before men so wise that they would not contradict him, were to take counsaile. He made an inuectiue against the inciuilitie and auarice of the Bastarne: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fiue thousand horse of them, hee said would bee as manie as he should need to vse; and not so manie, that hee should need to feare them. It had beene well done, if any of his counsailors would haue told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Armie of them, since without anie danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perrhæbia, into Thessalie: where wasting the Country, and filling themselues with spoile, they should make the Romanes glad to forsake Tempe, euen for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable seruice, whether they wonne any victorie, or not. This, and a great deale more, might haue beene alledged, if any man had dared to giue aduice freely. In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had beene with them before, was sent againe, to let them know the Kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmure of those many thousands that had beene drawne so farre to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those fiue thousand, whom the King would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceiued, that Antigonus could make no better answere, than shifting excuses; the Bastarne returned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftie messenger to escape vnhurt: which was more than hee could haue well expected.

Thus dealt Perseus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preserue his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painfull Office he was very soone discharged by L. Æmilius Paulus the new Consul: who in fifteene dayes after his setting forth from Italie, brought the Kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed ouer it a King so foolish and so cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. Æmylius Paulus the Consul. His iourney. He forceth Perseus to discampe. He will not hazard battaile with anie disaduantage. Of an Eclipse of the Moone. Æmylius his superstition. The Battaile of Pydna. Perseus his flight. He forsakes his Kingdom: which hastily yeelds to Æmylius. Perseus at Samothrace. He yeelds himselfe to the Romane Admirall, and is sent prisoner to Æmylius.

BY the Warre of Macedon, the Romanes hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity so moued them, that either * they decreed that Prouince to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betweene him and his fellow Consul; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it vpon him, than that so worthy a man was aduanced to the dignitie of a second Consulship. Hee refused to propound vnto the Senate any thing that concerned his Prouince; vntill by his Embassadours, thither sent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly vnderstood, in what condition both the Romane forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being throughly knowne to be such, as hath beene already told; the Senate appointed a strong supply, not onely to the Consul, but vnto the Nauie; and likewise to the Armie that lay betweene Illyria and Epirus; from which App. Claudius was remooued, and L. Anicius sent thither in his place. Æmylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much grauitie and authoritie. Hee requested those that did thinke themselues wise enough to manage this Warre, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him with their aduice; or else to gouern their tongues at home, and not take vpon them to giue directions by heare-say, and censure by idle reports: for hee told them plainely, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Æmilius, who died valiantly in the Battaile of Canna, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conforme themselues the more gladly vnto the instructions giuen by a wise and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Æmilius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his iourney; with an especiall hope of men, that hee should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, was more then could haue beene hoped or imagined. He came to Brundusium: whence, when the wind came faire, he set sayle at breake of day, and arriued safely at the Isle of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, hauing done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Campe; and was there in fiue dayes more. So are there but fiue of the fifteene dayes remaining, in which he finished the Warre.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium; hauing spared no labor of men and of women to fortifie the bankes of Enipeus, where it was fordable in drie weather: So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconuenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt vpon Dium; was lacke of fresh water. For there were ten miles betweene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betweene the Sea shore and the foote of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking foorth on that side. But Æmilius found present remedie for this, by digging Wells on the shoare; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shoare that wants them, though they rise not aboue the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging any neerer to the enemie, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the riuer of Peneus; where hee had watering at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of any worth. Yet when the Romane Campe had such meanes to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did; the passage onward beeing defended as hath beene already shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquirie was soone found out. There was a narrow passage ouer Olympus, leading into Perrhebia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire iourney. Martius eyther had not beene informed heereof; or durst not attempt it: or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the aduenture; they fearing lest it would proue such a piece of worke as had beene their march ouer Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and abilitie, to command. Hee had reformed, euen at his first comming, many disorders in the Romane Campe: teaching the souldiors among many other good lessons, to bee obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselues, as had beene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now hee appointed about fiue thousand men to this Enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Æmylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabij. Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable seruice against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darkenesse tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the Fleete; where victualls were prouided for their iourney: it being noysed, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and waste the Countrey. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where he lay, rather to diuert the Kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprise, than vpon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Channell of Enipeus, which receiued in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-well-neare all drie, yet it ſerued not for thoſe that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Æmylius employed none ſaue his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had aduantage at farre diſtance, though the Romanes were better appointed for the cloſe. The Engines from off the Tower which Perſeus had rayſed on his owne banke, did alſo beat vpon the Romans, and gaue them to vnderſtand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Æmylius perſiſted as hee had begunne; and continued his aſſault, ſuch as it could be, the ſecond day. This might haue ſerued to teach the Macedonians, that ſome greater worke was in hand: ſince otherwiſe a good Captaine, as Æmilius was knowne to bee, would not haue troubled himſelfe with making ſuch braueries, that were ſomewhat coſtly. But Perſeus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running fearefully downe the Mountaine, brought word into the Camp; That the Romanes were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himſelfe no leſſe (if not more) amazed then any of the reſt. Order was forthwith giuen to diſlodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haſte, the Campe was broken vp, and a ſpeedy retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were ſo, that they which had cuſtodie of the paſſage were taken ſleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force; Scipio and Fabius had very good ſucceſſe in their iourny. It may well be, that they ſlept vntill the Romans came ſomwhat neere to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrowes and ſlings could doe little ſeruice, were beaten at handie-ſtrokes: ſo as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, & an Epiſtle of Scipio, may each of them haue beene true. Thus was an open way cleered into Macedon: which had bin effected by Martius in the yeere ſore-going; but was cloſed vp againe, through his not proſecuting ſo rich an opportunitie.

Perſeus was in an extreame doubt what courſe to take, after this vnhappy beginning. Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and ſo to linger out the Warre: hauing been taught by the laſt yeeres example, how reſolute the people were in making defence. But farre worſe counſaile preuailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King reſolued to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing belike to put himſelfe into any one Towne, leſt that ſhould be firſt of all beſieged; and hee therein (as cowardly natures alwaies are iealous) not ouer-carefully relieued. This was euen the ſame that Æmylius, or anie inuader, ſhould haue deſired. So a place was choſen neere vnto Pydna, that ſerued well for the Phalanx, and had likewiſe on the ſides of it ſome peeces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There hee abode the comming of the enemie; who ſtayed not long behinde him. As ſoone as the Romans had ſight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than diſcretion, had haſted away from them, forſaking the Campe that was ſo notably well fortified: they deſired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately: doubting leſt otherwiſe the King ſhould change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Conſul; praying him not to loſe occaſion by delay. But Æmilius told him, That he ſpake like a young man; and therefore willed him to haue patience. The Romanes were tyred with their iourney; had no Campe wherein to reſt themſelues; nor any thing there, ſaue onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For theſe, and the like reſpects, the Conſul made a ſtand: and ſhewing himſelfe vnto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe meaſured out & entrenched behinde the Armie; whereinto, at good leyſure, hee fell backe, without any manner of trouble. After a nights reſt, it was hoped, both by the Romans and by the Macedonians, that the matter ſhould be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the ſame day. As for the King, hee excuſed himſelfe by the backwardneſſe of the enemy; who aduanced no further, but kept vpon ground ſeruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other ſide, the Conſul had the reaſons before ſhewed, which he communicated to thoſe about him the next day.

That euening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeere beene Prætor, foretold vnto the Conſul, and (with his good liking) vnto the Armie, an Eclipſe of the Moone, which was to bee the ſame night: willing the ſouldiors not to bee troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might bee knowne long before it was ſeene. It was the manner of the Romanes, in ſuch Eclipſes, to beat Pannes of Braſſe and Baſons, as wee doe in following a ſwarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great eaſe, and helped her in her labour. But this prognoſtication of Sulpitius conuerted their ſuperſtition into admiration of his deepe skill, wherein they ſaw it verified. Contrariwiſe, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyſe, as long as the Eclipſe laſted: rather perhaps becauſe it was their faſhion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigie betokening their loſſe; ſince their deſire to fight was no whit leſſened by it. I will not heere ſtand to diſpute, Whether ſuch Eclipſes doe ſignifie, or cauſe any alteration in ciuill affaires, and matters that haue ſmall dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of obſeruation it is, how ſuperſtition captiuates the vnderſtanding of the wiſeſt, where the helpe of true religion is wanting. Æmylius, though hee were ſufficiently inſtructed concerning this defect of the Moone, that it was no ſupernaturall thing, nor aboue the reach of humane vnderſtanding, ſo as he ſhould need to trouble himſelfe with any deuout regard thereof; yet could he not refraine from doing his duetie to this Moone, and congratulating with ſacrifice her deliuerie, as ſoone as ſhe ſhone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a ſage Philoſopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not aſſiſt him in this fooliſh deuotion; yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a ſacrifice done to Hercules; which was no leſſe fooliſh. For a great part of the day was vainely conſumed, ere Hercules could be pleaſed with any Sacrifice, and vouchſafe to ſhew tokens of good lucke in the entrailes of the beaſts. At length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth ſacrifice, was found a promiſe of victorie to Æmilius; but with condition, That hee ſhould not giue the onſet. Hercules was a Greeke, and partiall, as neerer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Romane. Wherefore it had beene better to call vpon the new goddeſſe, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romanes had beſtowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authenticall) vpon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of militarie affaires; and who therefore would haue limited his fauour, with no iniunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaile; Æmilius was throughly perſwaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwiſe he would not haue ſtayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leyſure ſerued to retyre whither hee liſted, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Conſul thought that he might wait vpon aduantage, without making any great haſte. Neyther was it to bee neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romanes faces: which would bee much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perſeus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Æmilius ſent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelyhood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clocke in the morning, a ſmall occaſion brought to paſſe that, which whereto neither of the Generalls had ouer-earneſt deſire.

A Horſe brake looſe at watering: which two or three of the Romane ſouldiers followed into the riuer, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the Water, to draw this horſe ouer to their owne ſide. Theſe fell to blowes, as in a priuate quarrell; and one of the Thracians was ſlaine. His Countrimen ſeeing this, haſted to reuenge their fellows death, and followed thoſe that had ſlaine him ouer the riuer. Heereupon company came in, to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew ſuch, as made it paſt a fray, and cauſed both the Armies to be carefull of the euent. In fine, each of the Generals placed his men in order of battaile, accordingly as the manner of his Country, and the Armes, wherewith they ſerued, did require. The ground was a flatte leuell, ſaue that on the ſides a few hillockes were raiſed heere and there; whereof each part might take what aduantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better ſouldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Conſul encouraged their men with liuely words: which the preſent condition could bountifully afford. But the King hauing finiſhed his Oration, and ſent on his men, withdrew himſelfe into Pydna: there to doe ſacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the leſſe maruaile, that hee durſt aduenture battaile, ſince hee had bethought himſelfe of ſuch a ſtratageme, whereby to ſaue his owne perſon. As for Hercules, he liked not the ſacrifice of a Coward: whoſe vnſeaſonable deuotion could bee no better than hypocriſie. For hee that will pray for a good Harueſt, ought alſo to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battaile, hee found it no better than loſt: and he, in looking to his owne ſafetie, cauſed it to be loſt altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, ſuch as wee find recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did ſo ſtoutly preſſe onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Æmylius was thereat much aſtoniſhed; That the Peligni ruſhing deſperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them ſlaine, and the ſquadrons following them ſo diſcouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. Theſe were the things that fell out aduerſe to the Romanes; and which the Conſul beholding, is ſaid to haue rent his coat-armor for griefe. If the King with all his power of horſe, had in like manner done his deuoyre; the victorie might haue beene his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battaile, was the ſame which doubtleſſe the Conſul expected, euen from the beginning: the difficultie, or almoſt the impoſſibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whileſt ſome of the Romanes ſmall battallions preſſed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was neceſſary (if the Macedonians would follow vpon thoſe which were put to the worſe) that ſome files hauing open way before them, ſhould aduance themſelues beyond the reſt that were held at a ſtand. This comming ſo to paſſe, admoniſhed the Conſul, what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vſe, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to the direction giuen by Æmilius, when hee ſaw the front of the Enemies great battaile become vnequall, and the rankes in ſome places open, by reaſon of the vnequall reſiſtance which they found. Thus was the vſe of the Phalanx prooued vnauaileable againſt many ſmall ſquadrons, as it had beene formerly in the battaile of Cynoſcephalæ: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vnſeruiceable againſt the other, by reaſon, that being not euery where alike diſtreſſed, it would breake of it ſelfe; though heere were little ſuch inconnenience of ground, as had beene at * Cynoſcephalæ. * Chap. 4. §. 13.

Perſeus, when hee ſaw his battaile begin to route, turned his bridle preſently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horſe eſcaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witneſſing the little good ſeruice which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercy of the Enemie: who ſlew aboue twenty thouſand of them; though hauing little cauſe to be furious, as hauing loſt, in that battaile, onely ſome foureſcore, or ſixeſcore men at the moſt. Some of the foote, eſcaping from the execution, ouertooke the King and his company in a wood; where they fell to rayling at the horſemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and ſuch other names, till at length they fell to blows. The King was in doubt leſt they had ill meaning to himſelfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by ſuch as thought it good. The reſt of the company diſperſed themſelues: euery one as his owne occaſions guided him. Of thoſe that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to leſſen. For hee fell to deuiſing vpon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was moſt due to himſelfe: thereby cauſing thoſe that knew his nature, to ſhrinke away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella; hee found his Pages and houſhold ſeruants, ready to attend him, as they had beene wont. But of his great men that had eſcaped from the battaile, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treaſurers that had the boldneſſe to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnſeaſonable admonitions, he ſtabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he ſent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore ſtanding in feare, leſt they that refuſed to come at his call, would ſhortly dare ſome greater miſchiefe: he ſtole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him only Euander (who had bin employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewiſe about 500. Cretians; more for loue of his money than of him. To theſe he gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie Talents, though ſhortly hee coozened them of ſome part thereof; making ſhew as if hee would haue redeemed it; but neuer paying the money. The third day after the battaile hee came to Amphipolis; where he exhorted the Towne-men to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne ſpeech being hindered by teares, appointed Euander to ſpeake what himſelfe would haue vttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themſelues.

Vpon the first fame of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garison: sending them forth vnder color of a gainefull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to be ridde of the King; they plainly bade Euander to be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to tarry: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which hee had there, in certaine vessells that hee found in the riuer Strymon; passed ouer to the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to liue safe, by priuiledge of the religious Sanctuarie therein.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the Kingdome fell into the power of Æmilius, within so few dayes after his victorie. Pydna which was neerest at hand, was the last that yeelded. About sixe thousand of the souldiours, that were of sundry Nations, flodde out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippias who had kept the passage ouer Ossa against Martius, with Pantauchus, who had beene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yeelding themselues and the Towne of Berœa, whither they had retired out of the battell. With the like message came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedan, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole body of all sense and strength. Neyther did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such termes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Romane Armie. Æmylius sent abroad into the Countrey, such as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while hee shall haue more.

It was soone vnderstod, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Consul, confirming the report. Hee sent these letters by person of such meane condition; that his case was pitied, for that hee wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of his writing was, to desire fauour: which though hee begged in tearmes ill beseeming a King; yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus, the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine the Title, refused to make any answere thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might bee sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuertheless, in this conference, hee was maruellous earnest, that hee might bee allowed still to retaine the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preserued his treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romanes would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his desire to liue at ease, and to bee called King. Yea it seemes that hee had indeede, euen from the beginning, a desire to liue in this Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the Warre, hee was dehorted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdome of Macedon, for such a paltrie Iland; and for that hee offered to lay vp the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwise. They vrge him to giue place vnto necessitie, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arriues at Samothrace Cn. Octauius the Romane Admirall, with his fleet: who assayes, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein, for feare of imprisonment, hee had now alreadie imprisoned himselfe. When all would not serue, a question was moued to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiuing into it one that had violated the like priuiledge of Sanctuary, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quicke. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the King, That Euander, who liues with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, whereof vnlesse he can cleare himselfe in iudgement, hee must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Maiestie, now past, makes them forbeare to say, that Perseus himselfe is charged with the same crime. But what will this auaile, when the minister of the fact being brought into iudgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perseus therefore willed Euander to haue consideration of the little fauour that can be expected at the Romans hand; who are like to be presidents and ouerseers of this iudgement: so as it were better to dye valiantly, since none other hope remaines, than hope to make good an ill cause; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this resolued Euander seemes to like well: and either kils himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poyson wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had stucke to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, saue his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leaue him vpon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the priuiledge of this holy Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme so much, who shall dare to gainesay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and euen that also lyable to dispute, which preserues him from captiuitie; he purposeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, vnto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one ship; who easily was perswaded to waft the King thence. With all secrecie the Kings money, as much as could be so conueyed, was carried aboord by night; and the King himselfe, with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him onely * Philip his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his sonne, being his * brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by a rope, and ouer a mudde wall. At his comming to the Sea-side, he found no Oroandes there: the Cretians had played a Cretian tricke, and he was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whilest Perseus was searching all along the shoare: who had stayed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere he could recouer the Temple. He ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, lest he should be taken; he hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ranne vp and downe making enquirie; till Octauius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoeuer, abiding with their master in Samothrace, should haue their liues and libertie, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselues to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had giuen the custodie of his children, deliuered them vp to Octauius. Lastly, Perseus himselfe, with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victory compleate. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of liuing, than of reigning therein; he might well haue brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by diuiding his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrary hopes of sauing his Kingdome by armes, and himselfe by flight; he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that haue beene wretched by their owne default. He was presently sent away to Æmylius; before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the victory ouer himselfe, as gotten vpon one of abiect qualitie, and therefore the lesse to be esteemed. Æmylius vsed to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for hauing, with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answere might haue beene returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearefull silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul tearmed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercy of the people of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Consuls Table, and respectiuely entreated, he was committed prisoner to Q. Ælius.

Such end had this Macedonian War, after foure yeers continuance: and such end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated vnto Rome.

Gentius, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

ABout the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius; had the like successe against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armie of fifteene thousand; with which hee was at Lissus, ready to assist King Perseus as soone as the money should come, whereof he had receiued onely ten Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way; fought with him; ouercame him; and draue him into * Scodra. This Towne was very defensible by nature, besides the helpe of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seeme vnpossible to be wonne, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victory; and therefore presented his Armie before the walles, making countenance to giue an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily haue defended themselues within the Towne, would needes issue foorth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than couragious: for they were beaten; and thereupon foorthwith began amazedly to treat about yeelding. The King sent Embassadours; by whom, at first, he desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadours, to haue recourse to such mediation. But he thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadours into prison; where they were still aliue. Hauing obtained three dayes respite, he passed vp a Riuer, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more priuately; though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Caruantius was comming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. He sent Messengers craving accesse vnto the Prætor: before whom hauing lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his folly present) he fell downe humbly, and yeelded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, friends, were presently giuen vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun; vntill Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had beene imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had passed.

How the Romans behaued themselues in Greece and Macedon after their victory ouer Perseus.

NOw began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to looke tyrannically vpon those that had beene vnmannerly toward them before, whilest the Warre with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with a bad grace; saying, that they were sent from Rhodes to make an ouerture of peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no lesse grieuous to the Romans themselues, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had beene expected. Hereto the Senate made answere, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for loue of Rome, but in fauour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (couetous of the charge) to haue Warre proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadours were so affrighted, that in mourning apparell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had beene any any whit auerſe from the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or ſent priſoners to Rome; excepting ſome that ſlue themſelues for feare, whoſe goods alſo were confiſcated. Yet this procured little grace; and leſſe would haue done, if olde M. Cato; a man by nature vehement, had not vttered a milde ſentence, and aduertiſed the Senate, That in decreeing Warre againſt Rhodes, they ſhould much diſhonour themſelues, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that Citie, which they were greedy to ranſacke, than any iuſt cauſe, had moued them thereto. This conſideration, together with their good deſerts in the Warres of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any marke remained aliue, ſaue thoſe that had beene of the Roman Faction. All which notwithſtanding, many yeeres paſſed, ere by importunate ſuit, they could be admitted into the ſocietie of the Romans: a fauour which till now, they had not eſteemed, but thought themſelues better without it, as equall friends.

Cæſar. in orat. apud Salluſt. de Conjurat. Catilinis.

With the like, or greater ſeueritie, did the Romans make themſelues terrible in all parts of Greece. Æmylius himſelfe made progreſſe through the Countrey, viſiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleaſure: yet not forgetting to make them vnderſtand what power he had ouer them. More than fiue hundred of the chiefe Citizens in Demetrias were ſlaine at one time by thoſe of the Roman faction, and with helpe of the Roman ſouldiers. Others fled, or were baniſhed, and their goods confiſcated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Conſul, the redreſſe was ſuch, as requited not the paines of making ſupplication. His friends, that is to ſay, thoſe which betrayed vnto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, he feaſted like a King, with exceſſiue cheere, yet ſo, that he had all things very cheape in his Campe: an eaſie matter, ſince no man durſt be backward in ſending prouiſions, nor ſet on them the due price. Embaſſadours likewiſe were ſent from Rome; ſome, to giue order for ſetling the eſtate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular inſtruction from the Senate than was vſuall in ſuch caſes; and ſome, to viſit the affaires of Greece. The Kingdome of Macedon was ſet at liberty by Æmylius and the Embaſſadours, his aſſiſtants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was ſuch as the Romans vſed to beſtow. The beſt part of it was, That the Tribute which had beene payed vnto the Kings, was leſſened by halfe. As for the reſt; the Countrey was diuided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were ſent captiue into Italy, with their wiues and children, as many as were aboue fifteene yeeres old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new giuen by Æmylius. Such miſchiefe the Senate thought it better to doe, at the firſt alteration of things in this Prouince, and in the time of Conqueſt, than otherwiſe to leaue any inconuenience that ſhould be worſe in the future. But concerning the Greekes, that were not ſubiects to Rome; the things done to them could deſerue no better name than meere tyrannie, yea and ſhameleſſe periury; were it not ſo, that the familiar cuſtome, among Princes and great Eſtates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation ſeeme of no validitie. The Embaſſadours that were ſent to viſit the Greekes, called before them all ſuch men of note, from euery quarter, as had any way diſcouered an vnſeruiceable diſpoſition towards the Romans. Theſe they ſent to Rome; where they were made ſure enough. Some of theſe had ſent letters to Perſeus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that reſpect, though they were no ſubiects, yet wanted there no colour, for vſing them as traytors, or at leaſt as enemies. But ſince onely two men were beheaded, for hauing beene openly on the Macedonian ſide; and ſince it is confeſſed, that the good Patriotes were no leſſe afflicted in this inquiſition, than they that had ſold themſelues to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcuſable Tyrannie. With the Achæans theſe Embaſſadours were to deale more formally: not ſo much becauſe that Common-wealth was ſtrong (though this were to be regarded by them, hauing no Commiſſion to make or denounce Warre) and like to proue vntractable, if manifeſt wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of ſigne, by letters, or otherwiſe, whereby any one of the Achæans could be ſuſpitiouſly charged to haue held correſpondence with the Macedonian. It was alſo ſo, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his adherents, had beene employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their ſeruice to the Romans, but onely ſuch as were the beſt Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embaſſadours neglect to vſe the benefit of the time: wherein, ſince all men trembled for feare of Rome, the ſeaſon ſerued fitly to ranke the Achæans with the reſt.

And

And hereto Callicrates was very vrgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, he and his fellowes should be made to pay for their mischieuous deuices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadours came among the Achæans: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callicrates had before instructed him. Hee said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perseus. This being so; he desired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence giuen, hee would name vnto them. After sentence giuen (cried out the whole assembly) what iustice were this? Name them first, and let them answere; which if they cannot well doe, wee will sopne condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their armies, were guiltie of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence; then should I likewise haue beene friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall throughly answere him, either here presently; or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of Xenon the Embassadour laid hold, and said that euen so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselues before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill he had cited aboue a thousand; willing them to appeare and answere before the Senate. This might euen be tearmed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their loue vnto their Countrey; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that vertue, and regard of the publike libertie, should dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achæans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since honestie had been thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achæans, nor yet held to be offendors. But in stead of better answere it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrie, that these men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any sollicitation of the Achæans, who neuer ceased to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; vntill after seuenteene yeeres, fewer than thirtie of them were enlarged, of whom that wise and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in prison; or hauing made offer to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome: or whether out of iayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserue the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiours, gaue order, That the whole Countrey of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Æmylius with mischieuous subtiltie. Hauing taken leaue of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vse the libertie bestowed vpon them by the people of Rome; he sent vnto the Epirots for ten of the principall men out of euery Citie. These he commanded to deliuer vp all the Gold and Siluer which they had; and sent along with them, into euery of their Townes, what companies of men he thought conuenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to sacke, euery one the Towne wherein to he was sent. Thus in one day were threescore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoyled by the Roman Souldiours; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserued punishment, as hauing fauoured Perseus. But since they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had beene already sent into Italie, there to receiue their due; and since this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present in good obedience, but had euen in this warre, done good seruice to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleeue it, had any one Writer deliuered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse marueilous, that God was pleased to make Æmylius childelesse, euen in the glory of his triumph, how great soeuer otherwise his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greekes and Macedonians.

ans. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacie of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before we speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadours came.

§. XI.

ANtiochus the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his raigne and life. He died the sixe and thirtieth yeere after he had worne a Crowne, and in the seuenteenth or eighteenth of Ptolemie Epiphanes: while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Iustine) of Iupiter. He left behinde him three sonnes, Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom hee had giuen in marriage to Ptolemie Epiphanes, King of Ægypt. Seleucus the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sonnes; reigned in Syria twelue yeeres, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Iosephus giue him but seuen. A Prince, who as hee was sloathfull by nature; so the great losse which his father Antiochus had receiued, tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeeres before his birth, Daniel gaue this iudgement, Et stabit in loco eius vilissimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) shall start vp a vilde person, vnworthy the honour of a King. Vnder this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the high Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: What time as the holy Citie was inhabited with all Peace, because of the godlinesse of Onias the Priest, it came to passe, that euen the King did honour the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Macchabees, of Simon of Beniamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple; and of Heliodorus sent by the King to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recouery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successour Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the raigne of this King, that the bookes of the Macchabees take beginning. Which bookes seeme not to be deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storie, nor of the acts of his successours, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and successour of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Macchabeus (who died in the hundred threescore and seuenteenth yeere of the Greekes in Syria) that first booke treateth. The Author of the second booke, although he take the Storie somewhat further off, by way of a Proeme, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeere of the Grecian raigne, and with the death of Nicanor, slaine by Iudas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Iason the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, preuailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Iansenius and other graue Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadours to the Iewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence betweene them and the Greekes, Ionathan the brother and successour of Iudas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereof Iosephus addes, that the name of the Lacedæmonian Embassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her clawes.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seuen and thirtieth yeere of the Greekes in Syria. He was the second sonne of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdome by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also he vsurped from his brothers sonne.

Ptolemie Philometor, his Nephew by his sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had beene about seuen yeeres King of Ægypt.

Ptolemie Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Ægypt foure and twenty yeeres, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to diuide his Kingdome betweene them, whileſt he was a childe. But they found ſuch other buſineſſe, ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vniuſt purpoſe; eſpecially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Prouinces of Cœloſyria, Phœnice, and Iudea, which he had won by his victory ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Ægyptian forces in thoſe parts. Neuertheleſſe, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby hee liued in the greater ſecuritie. He left behinde him two ſons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Phyſcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the yonger, by whom ſhee was caſt off, and her daughter taken in her ſtead. Such were the marriages of theſe Ægyptian Kings.

Ptolemie Philometor, ſo called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickname, becauſe he ſlew her, fell into hatred with his ſubiects, and was like to be chaſed out of his Kingdome, his yonger brother being ſet vp againſt him. Phyſcon hauing a ſtrong party, got poſſeſſion of Alexandria; and Philometor held himſelfe in Memphis, crauing ſuccour of King Antiochus his vncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vpon him the protection of the young Prince, ſought by all means poſſible to poſſeſſe himſelfe of that Kingdome. He ſent Apollonius the ſonne of Mneſtheus Embaſſadour into Ægypt, and vnder colour to aſſiſt the Kings Coronation, hee gaue him inſtructions to perſwade the Gouernours of the yong King Philometor, to deliuer the King his Nephew with the principall places of that Kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and deſire of his Nephewes ſafety and well doing. And the better to anſwere all argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came hee alongſt the coaſt of Syria to Ioppe, and from thence on the ſudden he turned himſelfe towards Ieruſalem, where, by Iaſon the Prieſt (a Chaplin fit for ſuch a Patron) he was with all pompe and ſolemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predeceſſour of Epiphanes, that impious Traitour Simon of the Tribe of Beniamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would haue deliuered the treaſures thereof to Apollonius Gouernour of Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, was diſappointed of his wicked purpoſe by miracle from heauen; the ſaid Apollonius being ſtrucken by the Angell of God, and recouering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet ſufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like vngodly practices. Preſently vpon the death of Seleucus, this Iaſon, the brother of Onias, ſeeking to ſupplant his brother, and to obtaine the Prieſthood for himſelfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threeſcore talents of ſiluer, with other rents and ſummes of money. So he got his deſire, though he not long inioyed it.

This naughty dealing of Iaſon, and his being ouer-reached by another in the ſame kinde, cals to minde a by-word taken vp among the Achaans, when as that miſchieuous Callicrates, who had beene too hard for all worthy and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus:

One fire than other burnes more forcibly,
One Wolfe than other Wolues does bite more ſore;
One Hawke than other Hawkes more ſwift does fly.
So one moſt miſchieuous of men before,
Callicrates, falſe knaue as knaue might be,
Met with Menalcidas more falſe than he.

And euen thus fell it out with Iaſon: who within three yeeres after, was betrayed, and ouerbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Prieſthood for himſelfe: Iaſon thereupon being forced to flye from Ieruſalem, and to hide himſelfe among the Ammonites.

From Ieruſalem, Antiochus marched into Phœnicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Ægypt; with which, and with a mighty armie of land-forces, He went about to raigne ouer Ægypt, that he might haue the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Ægypt with a mighty company with, Chariots and Elephants, with Horſemen, and with a great Nauie, and moued warre againſt Ptolemæus King of Ægypt, but Ptolemæus was afraid of him, and fled, & many were wounded to death. He won many ſtrong Cities, and tooke away the ſpoyles of the Land of Ægypt. Thus was fulfilled

Prophecie of Daniel: He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Prouinces, and he shall doe that which his Fathers haue not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeede had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victory ouer the Ægyptians, nor tooke from them so great riches. For he gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betweene Pelusium and the hill Cassius, after which he entred, and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Ægypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had smitten Ægypt, he turned againe, and went vp towards Israel and Ierusalem with a mightie people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlesticke for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the Powring Vessels, and the Bolles, and the golden Basons, and the Vaile and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. He tooke also the Siluer and the Gold, and the precious Iewels, and the secret Treasures: and when hee had taken away all, hee departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men. Dan. 11. v. 24. Hier. in Dan. Mac. l. 1. c. 1.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Ægyptian businesse. At what time he first laid claime to Cœlosyria, iustifying his title by * the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffely auerting, that this Prouince had not beene consigned ouer to the Ægyptian, or giuen in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Ægypt. The Achæans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greekes, pressed him, by seuerall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answere was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receiue their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw, that it was an hard piece of worke to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselues with intestine war, than by the terror of his armes, threatning destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any desire of comming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leauing the Ptolemies in very weake estate, the yonger almost ruinated by his inuasion, the elder hated and forsaken by his people. Lib. 6. * Cap. 5. §. 2. Polyb. Leg. 81. 82. Leg.

But how weake soeuer these Ægyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, that Antiochus might leaue them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other businesse at Ierusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Ierusalem, he rested him awhile at Antioch, and then made a iourney into Cilicia, to suppresse the Rebellion of the Thracians and other in those parts, who had bin giuen as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For Gouernour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authority about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Iason out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an Income, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof hee presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adioyning. This hee did, as it seemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Sostratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Iason) had certaine knowledge, being moued with zeale, and detesting the sacriledge of Menelaus, he reproued him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adioyning as a suburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grone, sweete Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to lust and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claime priuiledge, from the holinesse of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Onely I say for mine owne opinion; that the inconuenience is farre lesse, to hold this booke as Apocryphall, than to iudge this fearefull shift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not saue the life of the poore olde man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to slay Onias. So when hee came to Onias, hee counselled him craftily, giuing him his right hand with an oath, and perswaded him to come out of the Sanctuarie; so hee slew him incontinently without any regard of righteousnesse. Hereof Mac. l. 2. c. 4.

when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, He tooke away Andronicus his garment of purple, and rent his cloathes, and commanded him to be led throughout the Citie, and in the same place where he had committed the wickednesse against Onias, he was slaine as a murderer. In taking reuenge of this innocent mans death, I should haue thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Iustice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolemie, a Traytor to Ptolemie Philometor, hee condemned innocent men to death; who iustly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outragious will, and not by any regard of iustice: since he reuenged the death of Onias, yet slue those that were in the same cause with Onias; Who, had they told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, they should haue beene heard as innocent. By reason of such his vnsteadinesse, this King was commonly tearmed Epimanes, that is, mad, in stead of Epiphanes, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

Vers. 47.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Ægypt, and then were there seene throughout all the Citie of Ierusalem, forty daies long, horsemen running in the ayre with robes of gold, and as bands of Spearemen, and as troupes of Horsemen set in aray, encountring and coursing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarnings of God, all Histories haue deliuered vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Vespasian, a starre in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heauens directly ouer the City, after which there followed a slaughter like vnto this of Epiphanes, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Pliny tels vs, that Armies were seene fighting in the ayre from the morning till the euening.

In the time of Pope Iohn the eleuenth, a fountaine powred out blood in stead of water, in or neare the Citie of Genoa; soone after which the Citie was taken by the Saracens, with great slaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signes, Vipera hath collected many, and very remarkeable. But this one seemeth to mee most memorable, because the most notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the Off-spring of the Cæsars, as well naturall as adopted, tooke end; whereof this notable signe gaue warning.

Mercur. Vipera de Prodig. l. 8. Vipera de Prisco & sacro instituto.

When Liuia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Hen, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Liuia caused this Hen to be carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Hen came a faire encrease of white Poultrie; and from the little Branch there sprang vp in time a Groue of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did vse to carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Groue; & after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were obserued, when they happened to wither, to foreshew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeere of Nero, all the broodes of the white Hens died, and the whole Groue of Bayes withered at once. Moreouer, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Iewes did not thinke such strange signes to be vnworthy of regard; it appeares by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Sueton. Galba.

Now as the first voyage of Antiochus into Ægypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Memphis, nor strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Vncle; thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perswasion than by armes. Physcon had not yet forgotten the terrour of the former siege: the Alexandrines though they loued not Philometor, yet loued they worse to liue in scarcitie of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreame) since nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the yonger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helpes, and aboue all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein hee stood of his Vncle. For though Antiochus were gone out of Ægypt with his armie; yet had he left behinde him a strong garrison in Peluſium; retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Ægypt, to his owne owne vse. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to subiect his younger brother vnto him, which hee gaue in answere to all Embassadours; yet he now prepared to make a sharpe warre vpon them both. And to this end he presently furnished and sent out his Nauie towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Cœlosyria, ready to enter Ægypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadours sent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yeelde thankes to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That hee would rather be pleased to signifie what hee required to haue done in Ægypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answere, That hee would neither call backe his Fleete, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptolemie should surrender into his hands together with the Citie of Pelusium, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that hee should also abandon and leaue vnto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that he had vnto either of them for euer. For answere vnto these demands, hee set downe a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleete entred Nilus, and recouered as well those places which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Ægypt it selfe; for Memphis, and all about it, receiued Antiochus, being vnable to resist him. The King hauing now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by easie iourneyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Ægypt stood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or, were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a ciuill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the iuster cause. Yet they gaue signification, that it would be much displeasing vnto them, to haue the Kingdome of Ægypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loath to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuertheless, the Ægyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing ioyntly in neede of helpe against their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to be expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had beene sustained with food from Ægypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Ægyptian, had Aratus laide the foundation of that greatnesse, whereto the Achæans attained. And by the like helpe, had Rhodes beene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for sundry people abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requitall: but with continuance of suitable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde; especially to the Rhodians and Achæans, who seemed most able to giue it effectually. To the Romans, Physcon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeere since: but their Embassadours lay still in Rome. Of the Achæans they desired in particular, that Lycortas the braue warriour might be sent vnto them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius, Generall of the Horse. Hereunto the Achæans readily condescended: and would immediatly haue made performance, if Callicrates had not interposed his mischieuous art. Hee, whether seeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose seruice the Kings desired; withstood the common voyce; which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but withall their power, be ayding vnto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (hee said) conuenient time to entangle themselues in any such businesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeelde vnto the Romans, what helpe soeuer should be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction, obstinately persisted, terrifying others with bigge words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius

the late Conſull had ſignified vnto him, that the Romans were paſt all neede of helpe: adding further, that a thouſand foote, and two hundred horſe, might well be ſpared, to the ayde of their Benefactours, the Ægyptian Kings, without diſabling their Nation to performe any ſeruice to the Romans; for as much as the Achæans could without trouble, raiſe thirtie or fortie thouſand Souldiours. All this notwithſtanding, the reſolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Calliclates. For when it was thought that the Decree ſhould haue paſſed; he brought into the Theater where the aſſembly was held, a Meſſenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Achæans were deſired to conforme themſelues to the Roman Senate; and to labour as the Senate had done, by ſending Embaſſadours to ſet Ægypt in peace. This was an aduice againſt all reaſon. For the Senate had indeede ſent Embaſſadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater buſineſſe elſewhere, with ſuch milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Achæans ſhould doe any good in the ſame kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends, durſt not gaine-ſay the Roman Councell; which had force of an iniunction. So the Kings were left in much diſtreſſe; diſappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perſeus ouercome: and then might the Embaſſadour ſent from the Roman Senate, performe as much as any Armie could haue done.

Audience had beene lately giuen by the Senate, vnto thoſe Embaſſadours of Phyſcon and Cleopatra; which hauing ſtayed more then a whole yeere in the City, brought nothing of their buſineſſe to effect vntill now. The Embaſſadors deliuered their meſſage in the name of thoſe that had ſent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no leſſe than his Brother and Siſter.

In this ambaſſage of Ptolemie, now requeſting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from ſuch as it had beene before three or foure yeeres laſt paſt. For in the beginning of theſe his troubles, which beganne with the Macedonian Warre; either he, or Eulæus, or Lenæus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards layd) which had the gouernment of him, thought his affaires in ſuch good eſtate, that not onely hee determined to ſet vpon Antiochus, for Cœleſyria; but would haue interpoſed himſelfe betweene the Romans and Perſeus, as a competent Arbitratour; though it fell out well, that his Embaſſadour was by a friend perſwaded to forget that point of his errand. From theſe high thoughts he fell on the ſudden, by the rebellion of his brother and ſubiects, to liue vnder protection of the ſame Antiochus. And now at ſuch time as by atonement with his brother and ſubiects, he might haue ſeemed to ſtand in no neede of ſuch protection, he hath remaining none other helpe whereby to ſaue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their interceſſion which were imployed againſt him. This miſerable condition of him, his brother and ſiſter, ſhewed it ſelfe, euen in the habit of thoſe Embaſſadours. They were poorely clad; the haire of their heads and beardes ouergrowne, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands, branches of Oliue. Thus they entred into the Senate, and there fell, grouling and proſtrate vpon the floore. Their garments were not ſo meane and mournefull, nor their lookes and Countenances ſo ſadde and dejected, but that their ſpeech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For hauing told in what danger their King and Countrey ſtood; they made a pittifull and grieuous complaint vnto the Senate, beſeeching them to haue compaſſion of their Eſtate, and of their Princes, who had alwaies remained friendly and faithfull to the Romanes. They ſaid that the people of Rome had ſo much heeretofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of ſuch account and authoritie, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleaſed but to ſend their Embaſſadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his vndertaking vpon the King their Confederate; then would hee preſently raiſe his ſiege from before Alexandria, and with-draw his Armie out of Ægypt, into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or vſed any delay; then ſhould Ptolemie and Cleopatra, be ſhortlie driuen out of their Realmes, and make repaire to Rome; with ſhamefull diſhonour to the Senate, and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchſafed to relieue them.

Polib. Leg. 72

The Lords of the Senate moued with compaſſion, ſent incontinently C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimius, and A. Hoſtilius, as Embaſſadors to determine and end the warre betweene thoſe Kings. In commiſſion they had firſt to finde King Ptolemie, and then Antiochus, and to let them both vnderstand, that vnlesse they surceased, and gaue ouer Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate, and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or vsing delay. So these Romans together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, tooke their leaue, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward Ægypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. So neere was he to the end of his iourney, when the Roman Embassadours met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Rolle of paper, willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and hauing a little while considered of the businesse, he told Popilius, That hee would aduise with his friends, and then giue the Embassadours their answere. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rodde which hee held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answere as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandement, after hee had stayed and pawsed awhile, I will be content (quoth hee) to doe whatsoeuer the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Ægypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition; euen in such manner as * Daniel had propheſied long before: yea, fulfilling euery particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischiefe to Ierusalem after his returne; likeas if these things had rather beene historified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadors, they stayed awhile, and setled the Kingdome of Ægypt, leauing it vnto the elder brother, and appointed the yonger to reigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they felt, as it had beene, in the power of the Ægyptian, hauing first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already giuen an ouerthrow to the Ægyptian ships.

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Masanissa, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instabilitie of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octauius. With the Conclusion of the worke.

BY this peremptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceiue how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had beene well contented, a yeere before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his naturall condition, and to giue good language to the Achæans and Ætolians, when hee went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of farre lesse power than the King of Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse vsed any menacing tearmes, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victory ouer Perseus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallogreekes, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senatours: who bade him be confident, and request of the Senate his brothers Kingdome for himselfe; for it should surely be giuen him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee either approued, or seemed to approue the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaymed by the faithfull counsaile of Stratius a Physician; whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee deliuered the errand about which hee had beene sent; recounting his owne seruices done to the Romans in the late Warre, * where withall hee forgat not to make of his brother as good mention as hee could: and finally requested, That the Townes of Ænus and Maronea might be bestowed

* Liu. lib. 45.

* Polyb. Legat. 93. bestowed vpon himselfe. * By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceiued opinion, that he meant to craue another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore, to make him vnderstand how gracious he was, they not onely granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gaue to him (as was their custome to Embassadours that came with an acceptable message) they vsed singular magnificence. Polyb. ibid. Neuertheless, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilest he was yet in Italie, they gaue order for the libertie of Æmus and Maronea; thereby making vneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, reuoke. And as for the Gallogrecks, which were about to inuade the Kingdome of Pergamus; they sent Embassadours to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. He might well blame the folly of his second voyage thither, for this necessity of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, hee had layed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne doores. No sooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was ready to send him going. It was not thought expedient to vse him as an enemy, that came to visit them in loue: neither could they, in so doing, haue auoided the note of singular inconstancy: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had beene at Rome somewhat before; where hee was welcommed after a better fashion. Hee had learned to behaue himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For entring into the Senate, hee lay downe, and kissed the threshold, called the Fathers his gods and sauiours: as also hee vsed to weare a Cap, after the manner of slaues newly manumised, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. Hee was indeede naturally a slaue, and one that by such abiect flattery kept himselfe safe; though doing otherwise greater mischiefe than any wherewith Perseus had beene charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne Nicomedes, whom hee brought with him to Rome, there to receiue education. Further petition hee made, to haue some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the graunt would haue beene vniust, hee receiued a cold answere. But concerning the Wardshippe of his sonne, it was vndertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Ægypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But aboue all other Kings, Masanissa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controuersies they gaue iudgement on his side: and whereas hee had inuaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winne the Towes; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay fiue hundered Talents to the Numidian, for hauing hindered him of his due so long. Now indeede had Rome good leysure to deuise vpon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masanissa himselfe was shortly by them rooted vp. But heereof the olde King neuer dreamed. Hee sent to Rome one of his sonnes, to congratulate the victory ouer Perseus; and offered to come thither himselfe, there to sacrifice for ioy vnto Iupiter in the Capitol. His good will was louingly accepted; his sonne rewarded; and hee entreated to stay at home.

Cotys the Thracian sent Embassadours, to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him giuen to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to entreat, That his sonne, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at libertie for conuenient ransome. His excuse was not taken; since hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Perseus, by giuing hostages, without necessitie: Yet was his sonne giuen backe to him ransome-free, with admonition, to carry himselfe better toward the Romanes in time following. His Kingdome lay betweene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for these vnhappy Kings, Perseus and Gentius, they were led through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Æmilius and Anicius. Perseus had often made suite to Æmilius, that he might not be put to such disgrace: but hee still receiued one skornefull answere, That it lay in his owne power to preuent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himselfe. And surely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than hee found, he would rather haue sought his death in Macedon, than haue bin beholding to the courtesie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Romane clemencie, whereof Æmilius had giuen him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow King, had been led in chaynes through the streets, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of releasse. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe sacrifice, he should command the captiues to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honor of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were ouercome, might be both together at the vtmost. This last sentence of death was remitted vnto Perseus: yet so, that he had little ioy of his life; but eyther famished himselfe, or (for it is diuersly reported) was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of sleepe. Of his sons, two died; it is vncertaine how. The yongest called Alexander (onely in name like vnto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a Ioyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe vnder the Romane Officers. In such pouertie ended the Royall House of Macedon: and it ended on the suddaine; though some eightscore yeeres after the death of that Monarch, vnto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perseus had knowne it before, that his owne sonne should one day be compelled to earne his liuing by handie-worke, in a painefull Occupation; it is like, that he would not, as in a wantonnesse of Soueraignetie, haue commanded those poore men to bee slaine, which had recouered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diuing. Hee would rather haue beene verie gentle, and would haue considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most vndertroden wretches, are all subiect vnto the One high Power, gouerning all alike with absolute command. But such is our vnhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Doe as ye would be done vnto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie; we entertaine that arrogant thought, I will bee like to the most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath saith truly:

Posse volunt ——

Iuuenal. Sat. 10.

Euen they that haue no murdrous will,
Would haue it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, haue a vaine desire of abilitie to do euill without controule: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. God, who best can iudge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few: among whom also, very few there are, that vse it not to their owne hurt. For who sees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soueraigne authoritie to the vtmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne sonnes or nephewes to root vp all his progenie? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other neerenesse in bloud, be driuen to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that gouernes one, the most vnworthie of his whole house, yet reigning ouer all? The vntimely death of many Princes which could not humble themselues to such flattery; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hereof. Heereunto may be added, That the heyre of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemie, to exercise the same vpon the Line of that vnhappie King. Such examples of the instabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subiect;

subiect; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the euill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happie that Countrie is, which hath obtained a King able to conceiue and teach, That * God is the sorest and sharpest Schoolemaister that can be deuised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controlment to turne it vpside-downe at their pleasure.

* The true Law of free Monarchies.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Æmylius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was ledde along therein, as part of his owne spoyles; and in regard likewise both of the Conqueſt and of the Bootie. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Siluer carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasurie, that from thence forth, vntill the ciuil Wars which followed vpon the death of Iulius Cæsar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to haue bin hindred by the Souldiors; who grudged at their General, for not hauing dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by seuere exhortations. Thus Paulus enioyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuertheleſſe, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining sons, that were not giuen in adoption: of which, the one died fiue daies before the Triumph; the other three daies after it. This losse he bore wisely: and told the People, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie, since the ioy of his victorie was requited with his owne priuate calamitie, in stead of the publike.

Chap. 3. §. 4.

About the same time, Octauius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace; and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their seuerall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles; together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enough to say vnto Rome, Sume superbiam, Take vpon thee the Maiestie, that thy deserts haue purchased.

BY this which wee haue alreadie set downe, is seene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer haue ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. Wee haue left it flourishing in the middle of the field; hauing rooted vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaues shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, haue bin the subiect of those ancient Histories, which haue bin preserued, and yet remaine among vs; and withall of so many tragicall Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mighty men haue complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, these great Lords of the world haue beene stirred vp, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proues. And certainely, as Fame hath often beene dangerous to the liuing, so is it to the dead of no vse at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreame ill bargaine of buying this lasting discourse, vnderstood by them which are dissolued; they themselues would then rather haue wished, to haue stolne out of the world without noyse; than to be put in minde, that they haue purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and crueltie: by giuing in spoyle the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with so many and so variable sorts of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath beene no State fearefull in the East, but that of the Turk; nor in the Weſt any Prince that hath ſpred his wings farre ouer his neſt, but the Spaniard; who ſince the time that Ferdinand expel'd the Moores out of Granado, haue made many attempts to make themſelues Maſters of al Europe. And it is true, that by the treaſures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdoms which they poſſeſſe in Europe, they are at this day the moſt powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoyſed by the Perſian, ſo in ſtead of ſo many Millions as haue beene ſpent by the Engliſh, French, and Netherlands in a defenſiue Warre, and in diuerſions againſt them, it is eaſie to demonſtrate, that with the charge of two hundred thouſand pound continued but for two yeeres, or three at the moſt, they may not onely be perſwaded to liue in peace, but all their ſwelling and ouer-flowing ſtreames may bee brought backe into their naturall channels and old bankes. Theſe two Nations, I ſay, are at this day the moſt eminent, and to be regarded; the one ſeeking to roote out the Chriſtian Religion altogether, the other the truth and ſincere profeſſion therof; the one to ioyne all Europe to Aſia, the other the reſt of all Europe to Spaine.

For the reſt, if we ſeeke a reaſon of the ſucceſſion and continuance of this boundleſſe ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath beene already ſaid; That the Kings and Princes of the world haue alwaies laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of thoſe great Ones which præceded them. They are alwayes tranſported with the glorie of the one, but they neuer minde the miſerie of the other, till they finde the experience in themſelues. They neglect the aduice of God, while they enioy life, or hope it; but they follow the counſell of Death, vpon his firſt approach. It is hee that puts into man all the wiſedome of the world, without ſpeaking a word; which God with all the words of his Law, promiſes, or threats, doth infuſe. Death, which hateth and deſtroyeth man, is beleeued; God, which hath made him and loues him, is alwaies deferred. I haue conſidered (ſaith Salomon) all the workes that are vnder the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie, and vexation of ſpirit: but who beleeues it, till Death tells it vs? It was Death, which opening the conſcience of Charles the fift, made him enioyne his ſonne Philip to reſtore Nauarre; and King Francis the firſt of France, to command that iuſtice ſhould be done vpon the Murderers of the Proteſtants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which til then he neglected. It is therfore Death alone that can ſuddenly make man to know himſelfe. He tells the proud and inſolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the inſtant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent, yea, euen to hate their forepaſſed happineſſe. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath intereſt in nothing, but in the grauell that fills his mouth. He holds a Glaſſe before the eyes of the moſt beautifull, and makes them ſee therein, their deformitie and rottenneſſe; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, iuſt, and mighty Death! whom none could aduiſe, thou haſt perſwaded; what none hath dared, thou haſt done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only haſt caſt out of the world and deſpiſed: thou haſt drawne together all the farre ſtretched greatneſſe, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with theſe two narrow words, Hic iacet.

Laſtly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calls it ſelfe, The firſt part of the Generall Hiſtorie of the World, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I alſo intended, and haue hewne out; beſides many other diſcouragements, perſwading my ſilence; it hath pleaſed God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whoſe vnſpeakeable and neuer enough lamented loſſe, hath taught mee to ſay with Iob, Verſa eſt in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

FINIS.

To the Reader.

THe vſe of Chronologicall Tables is needfull to all Hiſtories, that reach to any length of time; and moſt of all, to thoſe that are moſt generall: ſince they cannot, like Annales, yeerely ſet downe all Occurrences not cohærent. This heere following, may ſerue as an Index to the preſent part of this worke; pointing vnto the ſeuerall matters, that hauing fallen out at one time, are farre diſioyned in the Relation. Certainly it is not perfect: neither doe I thinke, that any can be. For howſoeuer the yeares of the firſt Patriarchs may ſeeme to haue been well-neere compleat, yet in the reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Iſrael, we finde many fractions, and the laſt yeere, or yeeres, of one King reckoned alſo as the moſt of another. The ſame is moſt likely to haue fallen out in many other; though not precisely recorded. Heereto may be added the diuerſe and imperfect formes of the yee, which were in vſe among ſundry Nations: cauſing the * Summer Moneths, in proceſſe of ſome ages, to fall into the Winter; and ſo breeding extreme confuſion in the reckning of their times. Neither is it a ſmall part of trouble, to chuſe out of ſo many, and vtterly diſagreeing computations, as haue already gotten authoritie, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deale more, is to be alleaged, in excuſe of ſuch errour as a more intentiue and perfect Calculator ſhall happen to finde heerein. It may ſerue to free the Booke, and likewiſe the Reader (if but of meane iudgement) from any notorious Anachroniciſme; which ought to ſuffice. The Booke indeed will need it, euen in that regard; not onely for ſome errors of the preſſe, in the numbring of yeeres, but for ſome haſtie miſ-reckonings of mine owne; which I deſire to haue heereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table ſhall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the reſt, ſhall finde reaſon to be pleaſed with this, as tending wholly to his owne eaſe.

The Titles ouer the Columnes, haue reference to that which followes vnder them; as will readily be conceiued. Where two Titles, or more, are ouer the head, as | Rome / Nabonaſſar | there doe the numbers vnderneath anſwere proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Ieruſalem were finiſhed in the 319. yeere from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonaſſar. In like manner it is to be vnderſtood, That Iehoſaphat beganne his reigne in the 3774. of the Iulian Æra, in the 3092. of the World, & in the 99. yeare of the Temple. This needs not more illuſtration; nor indeed ſo much, to thoſe that are acquainted with works of this kinde. To auoid prolixitie, I haue forbome to inſert thoſe yeeres, which I finde not ſigned with ſome regardable accident: as with the birth or death of ſome Patriarch; the beginning of ſome Kings Reigne; ſome change of Gouernement; ſome Battaile fought; or the like. So, of the 13. yeares wherein Syluius Capetus reigned ouer the Latines, I note onely the firſt; that is; omitting all betweene the 4. of Iehoſaphat, wherein Capetus began, vnto the 17, wherein Syluius Auentinus ſucceeded, and wherein Iehoram firſt reigned with Iehoſaphat his father. For I thought it vaine to haue filled vp a page with 12 lines of idle cyphers; numbring forth 2.3.4.5. and ſo ſtill onwards, till I had come to the firſt of Auentinus, and the 17 of Iehoſaphat. In ſetting downe the Kings, there is noted ouer the head of euery one, what place he held in order of ſucceſſion: as whether he were the firſt, ſecond, fift, ſeuenth, or ſo forth, in ranke, of thoſe that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name is the firſt yeare of his reigne; at the end, or foot of the name (as the ſpace giues leaue) is the whole number of yeeres in which he reigned; in the ſpaces following vnderneath are thoſe yeeres of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of ſome other King, or with the yeere of any remarkeable accident.

accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name, there it is to be vnderstood, that the same yere belonged not onely to that King the beginning, but vnto some one, or more, of his fore-goers: as the first yeere of Ioram King of Israel was the same with the second of his brother Ahaziah, & the 22. his father Ahab. So, where two or three names are found in one place; as in the 77. yeare of the World, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri: it is meant that euery one of them reigned in some part of the same yeere; which is reckoned the second of Ela, & first of Omri. Particularly, vnder the yeeres of the Ægyptian Kings are set downe the yeares of those Dynasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise, erewhiles, the day of the moneth vpon which Nabonassars yeare began: which, beit varied from other yeares, may be found in the place last aboue cited.

Concerning the Æra, or accompt of yeeres, from Iphitus, to began the Olympiads from Rome built, from Nabonassar, and the like; as much as was thought conuenient hath been said, where due place was, in the Booke it self: so as it remaineth only to note, that vnder the title of Olympiads is set downe first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeere of that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his reigne in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first yeere thereof.

Now, for that the yeares of the World, of the Olympiad, of Rome, of Nabonassar, & other, had not beginning in one moneth, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the beer to expresse their seuerall beginnings, some painfull Chronologers haue diuided them proportionably in their seuerall Columnes, opposing part of the one yeare to part of the other: not (as I haue here done) cutting all ouerthwart with one streight line, as if it had begun and ended at one time. But this labour haue I spared, as more troublesom than vsefull; since the more part wold not haue apprehended the meaning, & since ye learned might well be without it. It will only be needfull to obserue, that howsoeuer the Æra of the Olympiads be 24. yeres elder than that of Rome, and 29, than that of Nabonassar, yet the reigne of some King may haue begun at such a time of the yeere as did not sute with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curius will easily finde my meaning: the vulgar will not find the difficultie. One familiar example may explane all. Queen Elizabeth began her reigne the 17. of November, in the yeare of our Lord 1558. She was crowned; held a Parliament; brake it vp; threw down Images; and reformed many things in Religion, all in her first yeere: yet not all in that yeere 1558, but the greater part in the yeere following; whether we begin with the first of Ianuarie, or with the 25 of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in his Table; but so, as the difference is neuer of a whole yeere.

The Iulian Period, which I haue placed, as the greater number, ouer the yeres of the World, was deliuered by that honorable and excellently learned Ioseph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Iulian yeeres, now in vse among vs. It consisteth of 7980. yeres, which result from the multiplicatiō of 19. 28. & 15, that is, of the Cycle of the Moon, the Cycle of the Sun, and the yeares of an Indiction. Being diuided by any of these, it leaues the number of the present yeere; or if no fraction remaine, it shewes the last yere of that Cycle to be current. For example: in the 4498. of this period, when was fought the great battaile of Cannæ, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sun 18, & consequently the Dominicall letter F. as may be found by diuiding the same number of the Iulian Period 4498, by 19. for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sunne. This Iulian Period, after the present accompt, alwaies exceedes the yeares of the world by 682. Besides the former vses, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a yeare, than any other Æra (as, From the beginning of the World, From the Floud, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more vncertain position.

More I shall not need to write, as touching the vse or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conuersant in workes of this kinde: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plaine enough to the vulgar.
